CIHM Microfiche Series (Monographs)

Technical and Bibliographic Notes / Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming are checked below.

Coloured covers /
Couverture de couleurCovers damaged /
Couverture endommagée
Covers restored and/or laminated /
Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée
Cover title missing / Le titre de couverture manque
Coloured maps / Cartes géographiques en couleur
Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black) /
Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)Coloured plates and/or illustrations /
Planches et/ou illistrations en couleurBound with other material /
Relié avec d'autres documentsOnly edition available /
Seule édition disponible
Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin / La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distorsion le long de la marge intérieure.

Blank leaves added during restorations may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming / II se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.

Additional comments /
Commentaires supplémentaires:

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

Coloured pages / Pages de couleur

Pages damaged / Pages endommagéesPages restored and/or laminated /
Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées
Pages discoloured, stained or foxed /
Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées
Pages detached / Pages détachées

Showthrough / Transparence

Quality of print varies /
Qualité inégale de l'impressionIncludes supplementary material /
Comprend du matériel supplémentaire
Pages wholly or partially obscured by errata slips, tissues, etc., have been refilmed to ensure the best possible image / Les pages totalement ou partiellement obscurcies par un feuillet d'errata, une pelure, etc., ont été filmées à nouveau de façon à obtenir la meilleure image possible.

Opposing pages with varying colouration or discolourations are filmed twice to ensure the best possible image / Les pages s'opposant ayant des colorations variables ou des décolorations sont filmées deux fois afin d'obtenir la meilleure image possible.

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked beiow /
Ce document est filmó au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

The copy filmed hure hes been reproduced thenks to the generosity of:

National Library of Canada

The imeges uppeering here are the best quality possible considering the condision und legibility of she original copy and in keeping with the filming contract epecificetione.

Original copies in printed peper covers ore filmed beyinning with she frons cover und ending on the lest pege with d prinied of illustrused impression, or the buck cover when appropriate. All orner original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impres. ston, end ending on the lest pege with printed or illustreied impression.

The lest recordad freme on eech microfiche shall contein the symbol $\rightarrow$ Imeaning "CON. TINUED"), of the symbol $\nabla$ imeening "END"I. whichover applies.

Maps. plutes. charts, etc.. may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too lurge 80 be ensirely included in one exposure ure filmed beginning in the upper lett hand corner. Ieft to rignt and top so bottom. es meny frames as required. The following diegrams illustrete the method:

L'exemplaire filme fut seproduit grace a la gendrosit de:

Bibliothèque nationale du E:anada

Les images suiventes ont ete reproduites avec le plus grand soin. compte renu de la condition et de la nettete de l'exemplaire filme. ot an conformite avec les condisions du sontret de filmage.

Les exemplaires origineux dont la couverture en pepier est imprimee sont filmes en commençant pur le premier plat et en terminant soit par le dernidre page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou dillustration, soit par le sucond plet, selon le ces. Tous les outres exemplaires origineux sont filmos en commencent par la premitre pege qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminent par Is derniere pege qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants appareitra sur la dernidre imege de chaque microtiche. selon le cas: Io symbole $\rightarrow$ signifie "A SUIVRE". 10 symbole $\nabla$ signitie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tebleoux, erc.. pouvent erte filmes des taux de reduction differents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour etre reproduit en un seul clicht. il est filme a pariir de l'angle supdrieur gauche. de gauche aroite. ot de haut on bas, on prenant le nombre d'imeges necessaire. Les diagrammes suivants lllustrent la mothode.

Mi: ROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)

125
194 JTer

THE NEST-BUILDER

 IHE SWVAY OF THE SHID"

THE NEST-BULLDER a Norri.

H

'rotac) C (

1 : "illshlins

$$
\begin{array}{r}
1 \\
-24
\end{array}
$$

THE NEST-BUILDER A NOVEL

ByBEATRICE FORBES-ROBERTSON HALEAUTHOR OF "WHAT WOMEN want", WTTI A FRO.VTISPIECE BY

.r. HENR

TORONTO
COPP, CLARK COMPANY, Limited
rublishers

Copyright, 1216, by Fredemick A. Storlas Comiany

All rights reserved

Aade in U. S. A.

CONTENTS

PART I
PAGE
PAGE
Mate-song ..... 1
PART II
Mated ..... $5:$
PART III
The Nestling ..... 163
PART IV
Wings ..... 237
PART V
The Builder ..... 345

PART I

MATE-SONG

THE NEST-BUILDER

I

OUTBOUND from Liverpool, the Lasitania bneked down the Irish Sea against a September gale. Aft in her second-class quarters each shouldering from the waves brought a sickening vibration as one or another of the ship's great propellers raced out of water. The gong had sounded for the second sittiris, and trails of hungry and weary travelers, trooping down the companionway, met files of still more uneasy diners emerging from the saloon. The grinding jar of the vessel, the heavy smell of food, and the pound of ragtime combined to produce an effect as of some sendid and demoniae orgy-an effeet derided by the smug respectability of the saloon's furnishings.
Stefan Byrd, taking in the seene as he balanced a precarious way to his seat, felt every hypereritieal sense rising in revolt. Even the prosaic but admirably effcient table utensils repelled him. "They are so useful, so abominably enduring," he thought. The mahogany trimmings of doors and colunns seemed to announce from every overpolished surface a pompous self-sufficiency. Eael table proelaimed the rsthetic level of the second class through the lifeless leaves of a rubber plant and two imitation cut-glass dishes of tough fruit. The stewards, casually liovering, laeked the democracy which might have humanized the steerage as nuch as the civility which would have oiled the workings of the first eabin. Byrd resented their ministrations as he did the heavy English dishes of the bill of fare. There were no Continental passengers near him. He had left the dear French tongue behind, and his ears, homesiek already, shrank equally from the see-saw Lancashire of the stewards an': the monotonous rasp of returning Americans.

2 THE NEST-BUILDER

byrd is left hand neighbor, a clergyman of uncertain denomination, had tried vainly for several minutes to attract his attention by c!caring his throat, passing the salt, and making measured requests for water, bread, and the like.
"I presume, sir," he at last inquired loudly, "that yon are in Americal, and as glad as I am to be returning to our comutry?"
"No, sir," retorted Byrd, favoring his quesioner with a wituering stare, "I am a Bohemian, and damnably sorry that I ever have to sce America egain."
The man of God tnrned away, pale to the temples with offense-a higlt-bosomed matron opposite emitted a slocked "Oh!"-the faces of the surrounding listeners assumed expressions either dismayed or deprecating. Budding conversationalists were temporarily frost-bitten, and the watery helpings of fish were eaten in a constrained silence. But with the inevitable roast beef a Seot of unshakeable manner, decorated with a yellow forehead-lock as erect as a striking cobra, turned to follow up what he apparently conceived to be an opportunity for discussion.
"I'm not so strongly partial to the States mysel', ye ken, but I'll cenfess it's a grand place to mak' moncy. Ye would be going thcre, perhaps, to improve your fortunes?"

MATE-SONG

Byrd was silent.
"Also," continucd the Seot, quite unrebuffed, "it would be interesting to know what exactly ye mean when ye eall yoursel' a Bohemian. Would ye be referring to your tastes, now, wi to your nationality ?"

His hand trembling with nervous temper, Byrd laid down his napkin, and rose with an attempt at dignity somewhat marred by the visclike eluteh of the swivel chair upon his emerging legs.
"My mother was a Bohemian, my father an American. Neither, happily, was Scotch,' said he, almost staminering in his attempt to control his extreme distaste of his surroundings-and hurried out of the saloon, leaving a table of dropped jaws behind him.
"The yomg man is nairvous," contentedly boomed the Seot. "I'in thinking lie'll be feeling the sea already. What kind of a liace would Bohemia be, d'ye think, to have a mother from:', turning to the elergyman.
"A place of evii life, seemingly," answered that worthy in his high-pitched, earrying voice. "I shall certainly ask to hare my seat ehanged. I eannot subjeet myself for the voyage to the neighborhood of a man of profane specell."

The table nodded approval.
"A traitor to his comntry, too," said a pursy little man opposite, snapping his jaws shut like a turtle.

A bony New Encland spinster turned deprecating eyes to him. "My," she whispered shrilly, "he was just terrible, wasn't he? But so handsome! I can't help but think it was more seasiekness with him than an evil nature."
Meanwhile the subject of diseussion, who would have writhed far more at the spinster's palliation of his of-

4

 THE NEST-BUILIERfense than at the men's distum, lay in his timy cabin, a prey to an attank of that nervons misery which orertakes an artist ont of his clement as survly and speedily us nir suffocentes a fish.
Stefan Byrd's table companions were guilty in his eyes of the one minforgivable sin-they were ngly. Uhly alike in feature, dress, and bearing, they had for hine absoIntely no exense for existence. He felt ho houd of rommon limmanty with them. In his lexicon what was not beautiful was not human, nut he recognized no more obligation of good fellowship toward them than he wonld have done toward a company of gromal-logs. He lay back, one the and nervous hand across his eyes, trying to obliturate the image of the saloon and all its inmates by eonjuring up a vision of the world he lad left, the winsome young cosmopolitan Paris of the art student. The streets, the eafis, the stud? ; his few men, his many women, friends-Adolph Jensen, the kindly Swede who loved him; Lonise, Nanctte, the little Polish Yanina, who had said they loved him ; the slanting-gianeed Turkish students, the grave Syrians, the demoeratie un-British Londoners-the smell, the glamonr of Paris, returned to him with the nostalgia of despair.

These he had left. To what did he go?

IN his shivering, creaking tittle eabin, suspended, as it were, by the sertain waters between two lives, Byrd foreed himself to remember the America he had known before his Paris days. He recalled his birth-place-a village in upper Miehigan-and his mental eyes hored across the pictures that eame with the ruming speed of a cinematograph to his memory.

The plare was a village, but it ealled itself a city. The last he had seen of it was the "depot," a wooden shed smrounded by a waste of rutted snow, and backed by grimy coal yards. He conld see the broken shades of the town's one hotel, which faced the traeks, drooping across their dirty windows, and the lopsided sign which proclaimed from the poreh roof in faded gilt on black the name of "C. E. Trench, Prop." He could see the swing-loors of the bar, and hear the eliek of balls foom the poolroom a.vertising the second of the town's distractions. INe could smell the composite odor of varnish, stale air, and boots, which made the overheated station waiting-room hideons. Heavy farmers in ear-mitts, peaked caps, and fur collars spat upon the hissing stove round whieh their great lide boots sprawled. They were his last memory of his follow eitizens.

Looking farther back Stefan saw the town in summer. There were trees in the street where he lived, but they were all upon the sidewalk-publie property. In their yards (the word garden, he recalled, was never used) the neighbors kept, with unanimity, in the back, washing, and in the frout, a porch. Over these porehes parched vines crept-the town's enthusiasm for horticulture went as far as that-and upon them coneentrated the feminine social life of the place. Of this intereourse the high tones seemed to be giggles, and the bass the wooden thuds of rockers. Strect after street he could recall, from the square about the "depot" to the outskirts, and through them all the dusty heat, the rockers, gigglers, the rustle of a shirt-sleeved father's newspaper, and the shrill cooees of the younger ehildrem. Finally, the piano-for he lonked back farther than the all-eonquering phonograph. He heard "Nita, Juanita;" he heard "Sweet Genevieve."

Beyond the village lay the open country, level, blindingly hot, half-eultivated, with the seorehed foliage of young trees showing in the ruins of what had been forest land. Aeross it the roads ran straight as rulers. In the winter wolves were not unknown there; in the summer there were tramps of many strange nationalities, farm hands and men bound for the copper mines. For the most part they walked the railroad ties, or rode the freight cars; winter or summer, the roads were never wholly safe, and children played only in the town.
There, on the outskirts, was a shallow, stony river, but deep enough at one point for gingerly swimming. Stefan scemed never to have been eool through the summer except when he was squatting or paddling in this hole. He remembered only indistinctly the bovs with whom he bathed; he had no friends among them. But there had becu a little girl with starched white inirts, huge blue bows over blue eyes, and yellow hair, whom he had admired to adoration. She wanted desperately to bathe in the hole, and he demanded of her mother that this be permitted. Stefan smiled grimly as he recalled the horror of that lady, who had boxed his ears for trying to lead her girl into ungodimess, and to seandalize the neighbors. The friendship had been kept up surreptitionsly afier this, with interelange of peneils and eandy, until the little girl-he had forgotten her name-put her tongue out at him over a matter of ehewing-ghm which he had insisted she should not use. Revolted, he played alone again.

MATE-SONG

The Iresbyterian Chureh Stefan remembered as a whitewashed praying box, resounding to his father's highpitchel voice. It was filled with heat and flies from withont in summer, and heat and steam from within in winter. The sehool, whitewashed again, he reealled as a suceession of banging desks, flying paper pellets, and the drone of undigested lessons. Here the water bucket loomed as the alleviation in summer, or the red hot oblong of the open stove in winter time. Through all these seenes, by an egotistical trick of the brain, he sar himself moving, a small brown-haired boy, with olive skin and queer, greenish eyes, entirely alien, absolutely lonely, e mpletely critical. He saw himself in too large, illchosen elothes, the butt of his playfellows. He saw the sidelong, interested glances of little girls change to emrled lips and tossed heads at the grinning nudge of their boy companions. He saw the harassed eyes of an anamie teacher stare meomprehendingly at him over the pages of an exereise book filled with eolored drawings of George III and the British flag, instead of a deseription of the battle of Bunker IIill. He remembered the hatred he had felt eren then for the narrowness of the loeal patriotism which had prompted him to this revenge. As a result, he saw himself backed against the sehoolhouse wall, facing with eontempt a yelling, junping tangle of boys who, from a safe distance, called upon the "traitor" and the "Dago" to eome and be lieked. He felt the rage momnt in his head like a burning wave, saw a change in the cyes and faces of his foes, felt himself spring with a catlike leap, his lips tight above his teeth and his arms moving like clawed wheels, saw boys run yelling and himself darting between them down the road, to fall at last, a trombling, sobbing bundle of reaction, into the grassy diteh.

In meinory Stefan followed himself home. The word was used to denote the housc in which : and his father lived. A portrait of his mother hung over the parlor stove. It was a chalk d ing from a photograph, erudely donc, but beautifur by reason of the subject. The face was young and very round, the forehead beautifully low and broad under black waves of hair. The nose was short and prond, the chin small but square, the mouth gaily curving around little, even teeth. But the eyes were decp and somber; there was passion in them, and romanee. Stefan had not seen that face for years, he barely remembered the original, but he could have drawn it now in crery detail. If the house in whieh it hung could be called home at all, it was by virtue of that pieture, the only thing of beauty in it.

Behind the portrait lay a few memorics of joy and heartaehe, and onc final one of horror. Stefan probed them, still with his nervous hand across his eyes. He listened while his mother saug gay or mouruful little songs with latunting tunes in a tongue only a word or two of winieh he understood. He watehed while she drew from her bureau drawer a box of paints and some paper.

MATE-SONG

She painted for long hours, day after day through the winter, while he played beside her with longing eyes on her brushes. She painted always one thing-flowersusing no peneil, drawing their shapes with the brush. Her flowers were of many kinds, nearly all strange to him, but most were roses-pink, yellow, erimson, ahmost black. Sometimes their petals flared like wings; sometimes they were elose-furled. Of these paintings he remembered much, but of her speceh little, for she was silent as she worked.
One day his mother put a brush into his hand. The rapture of it was as sharp and near as to-day's misery. Ie sat beside her after that for many days and painted. First he tried to paint a rose, but he had never seen such roses as her brush drew, and he tired quickly. Then he drew a bird. His mother nodded and smiled-it was good. After that his memory showed him the two sitting side by side for weeks, or was it months? -while the snow lay piled beyond the window-she with her flowers, he with his birds.
First he drew birds singly, hopping on a braneh, or simply standing, elaws and beaks defined. Then he began to make ti:m fly, alone, and again in groups. Their wings spread aeross the paper, wider and more sweepingly. They pointed upward sharply, or lay flat aeross the page. Flights of tiny birds earcened from corner to corner. They were blue, gold, searlet, and white. IIe left off drawing birds on branches and drew then only in flight, sinudging in a blue background for the sky.

One day by aceident he made a dark smudge in the lower left-hand eorner of his page.
"What is that?" asked his mother.

10

 THE NEST-BUILDERThe little boy looked at it doubtfully for a moment, unwilling to admit it a blot. Then he laughed.
"Mother, Mother, that is Ameriea." (Stefan heard limself.) "Look!" And rapidly he drew a bird flying high above the blot, with its head pointed to the right, away from it.

His mother laughed and hugged him quickly. "Yes, eastward,' she said.

After that all his birds flew one way, and in the lefthand lower corner there was usually a blob of dark brown or blaek. Onee it was a square, red, white, and blue.

On her table his mother had a little globe whieh revolved above a brass base Beeause of this he knew the relative position of two places-Ameriea and Bolremia. Of this eountry he thought his mother was unwilling to speak, but its name fell from her lips with sighs, withas it now seemed to him-a wild longing. Knowing nothing of it, he had pietured it a paradise, a land of roses. He seemed to have no knowledge of why she had left it ; but years later his father spoke of finding her in Boston in the days when he preaehed there, penniless, searehing for work as a teaeher of singing. How she beeame jettisoned in that-to her-cold and inhospitable port, Stefan did not know, nor how soon after their marriage the two moved to the still more alien peninsula of Michigan.
Into his memories of the room where they painted a shadow eonstantly intruded, ehilling then, such a shadow, deep and cold, as is east by an ieeberg. The door would open, and his father's face, high and white with ice-blue eyes, wonld hang above them. Instantly, the man remembered, the boy would cower like a fledgling beneath the sparrow-hawk, but with as much distaste as fcar in his cringing. The words that followed always seemed the same-he could reconstruct the scene clearly, but whether it had occurred once or many times he could not tell. His father's voice would snap across the silence like a high, tight-drawn string-
"Still wasting time? Have you nothing better to do? Where is your scwing? And the boy-why is he not outside playing?"
"This helps me, Henry," his mother answered, hesitating and low. "Surely it does no harm. I cannot sew all the time."
"It is a childish and vain occupation, however, and I disapprove of the boy being encouraged in it. This of course you know perfectly well. Under ordinary circumstances I should absolutely forbiu - i is, I condemn it."
"Henry," his mother's voice trembled, "don't ask me to give up his companionship. It is too cold for me to with him."
This sentence terrificd Stefan, who did not know the meaning of it. He was glad, for once, of his father's ridicule.
"That is perfectly absurd, the shallow excuse women always make their husbands for self-indulgence," said the man, turning to go. "You are a healthy woman, and would be more so but for idleness."

His wife called him back, pleadingly. "Please don't be angry with me, I'm doing the best I can, Henrythe very best I ean." There was a sweet foreign blur in her speech, Stefan remembered.
His father paused at the door. "I have shown you

12

THE NEST-BUILDER

your duty, my dear. I am a minister, and you cannot expect me to condone in my wife habits of frivolity and idleness whieh I should be the first to reprimand in my flock. I expect you to set an example."
"Oh," the woman wailed, "when you married me you loved me as I was-'

With a look of controlled annoyance her husband closed the door. Whether the memory of his father's words was exaet or not, Stefan knew their effeet by heart. The door shut, his mother would begin to ery, quietly at first, then with deep, eateling sobs that seemed to stifle her, so that she rose and paced the room breath. lessly. Then sle would hold the boy to her breast, and slowly the storm would change again to gentle tears. That day there would be no more painting.

These, his earliest memories, culininated in tragedy. A spring day of driving rain witnessed the arrival of a gray, plain-faced woman, who mounted to his mother's room. The house seemed full of mysterious bustle. Presently he heard noous, and rushed upstairs thinking his mother was erying and needed linn. The gray-haired woman thrust him from the bedroom door, but he returned again and again, ealling his mother, until his father emerged from the study downstairs, and, seizing him in his cold grip, pushed him into the sanetum and turned the key upon him.

Mueh later, a man whom Stefan knew as their doetor entered the room with his father. A strange new word passed between tlem, and, in his high-strung state, impressel the boy's memory. It was "ehloroform." The doetor used the word several times, and his father shook his head.
"No, doctor," he heard him saying, "we neither of us approve of it. It is eontrary to the intention of Cod. Besides, you say the ease is normal."

The doetor seemed to be repeating something about nerves and hysteria. "Exactly," lis father replied, "and for that, self-control is needed, and not a drug that reverses the dispensation of the Almighty."
Both men left the room. Presently the boy heard shricks. Lying, a grown man, in his berth, Stefan trembied at the memory of them. He fled in spirit as he had fled then-out of the window, down the roaring, swimming street, where he knew not, pursued ky a writhing horror. Hours later, as it seemed, he returned. The shades were pulled down across the windows of his house. His mother was dead.
Looking baek, the man hardly knew how the eonvietion had come to the eliild that his father had killed his mother. A vague comprehension perhaps of the doetor's urgings and his father's denials-a head-shaking mutter from the nurse-the memory of all his mother's tears. He was hardly more than a baby, but he had always feared and disliked his father-now he hated him, blindly and intensely. IIe saw him as the eause not only of his mother's tears and death, but of all the ugliness in the life about him. "Bohemia," he thought, would have been theirs but for this man. He even blamed him, in a sullen way, for the presence in their house of a tiny little red and wizened objeet, singularly t:gly, whieh the gray-haired woman referred to as lis "brother." Obviously, the thing was not a brother, and his father must be at the bottom of a conspiraey to deceive lim. The ereature made a great deal of noise, and when, by and by, it went away, and they told him his brother too was dead, he felt nothing but relief.

14

 THE NEST-BUILDERSo darkened the one bright room in his childhood's mansion. Obscured, it left the other chambers dingier than before, and filled with the ache of loss. Slowly he forgot his mother's companionship, but not her beauty, nor her roses, nor "Bohemia," nor his hatred of the "America" which was his father's. To get away from his native town, to leave America, became the steadfast purpose of his otherwise unstable nature.

The man watehed himself through high school. He saw himself still hating his surroundings and ignoring his schoolfellows-save for an oecasional girl whose face or hair showed beauty. At this time the first step in his plan of escape shaped itself-he must work hard enough to get to eollege, to Ann Arbor, where he had heard th. re was an art course. For the boy painted now, in all his spare time, not increly birds, but dogs and horses, boys and girls, all creatures that had speed, that he could draw in action, leaping, flying, or running against the wind. Even now stefan could warm to the triumph he felt the day he diseovered the old barn where he eould summon these shapes lindetected. His triumph was over the archenemy, his father-who had forbidden him paint and brushes and confiseated the poor little fragments of his mother's work that he had hoarded. His father destined him for a "fitting" profession-the man smiled to remember it-and with an impressive air of generosity gave him the choice of three-the Church, the Law, or Medicine. Hate had given him too keen a eomprehension of his father to permit him the mistake of argument. He temporized. Let him be sent to colloge, and there be would discover where his aptitude lay.
So at last it was decided. A trunk was found, a motheaten bag. His cheap, ill-cut clothes were packed. On a day of late summer he stepped for the first time upon a train-beautiful to him beeause it moved-and was borne sonthward.

At Ann Arbor he found many new things, rules, and people, but he brushed them aside like flies, hardly pereeiving them; for there, for the first time, he saw photographs and easts of the world's great art. The first sight, even in a poor copy, of the two Discoboli-Diana with her swinging knee-high tunic-the winged Victory of Samothraec-to see them first at seventeen, without warning, without a glimmering knowledge of their existence! And the pietures! Portfolios of Angelo, of the voluptnous Titian, of the swaying forms of Bottieelli's maidens-trite enongh now-but then!

How long he conld have deceived his father as to the real nature of his interests he did not know. Already there had been complaints of eut lectures, reprimands, and letters from home. Evading nathematies, seience, and divinity, he read only the English and classie sub-jeets-because they contained beauty-and drew, copying and ereating, in every odd moment. The storm began to threaten, but it never broke; for in his second year in eollege the unbelievable, the miracle, happened -his father died. They sai?? he had died of pneumonia, contracted while visiting the siek in the winter blizzards, and they praised him; but Stefan hardly listened.

One fact alune stood out amid the ugly affairs of death, so that he regarded and remembered nothing else. He was free-and he had wings! His father left insurance, and a couple of savings-bank aceounts, bit through some fissure of vanity or earelessness in the granite of his propriety, he left $n o$ will. The sums, amounting in all to something over three thousand dollars, came to Stefan

16

 THE NEST'BUILDERwithout conditions, guardians, or other hindrances. The rapture of that diseovery, he thought, almost wiped out his father's debt to him.

He knew now that not Bohemia. but Paris, was his El Doralo. In widd haste lor made realy for his jourme?, leaving the rigid trappinss of his home to be soll after him. lhat his dead father was to give him one more pang-the seates were to swing monen at the last. For when he would have packed the only possession, other than a few meeessities, he plamed to earry with him, he found his mother's pieture gone. Hying, his father, it appeared, had wallered from his bed, detached the portrait, and with his own hands burnt it in the stove. The motive of the ant stefan could not eomprehend. He only knew that this man had robbed him of his mother twice. All that remained of her was her wedding ling, which, drawn from his father's eash-box, he wore on his little finger. With bitterness amid his joy he took the train once more, and saw the lights of the town's shabby inn blink good-bye behind its frazzled shades.

III

BY'RD) had lived for seveat years in laris, wandering on foot in sumancr throngh math of France and Italy. His little patrimony stretehed to the last sou, and supplemented in hater years by the ocerasional sate of his work to small dealers, had sumficed hime so long. Ilis headruarters were in a high windewed attic faeing north along the rue des Quatre Ermites. Ilis work had been much admired in the ateliers, but his personal unpopularity with the majority of the students had prevented their admiration chamging to a friendship whose demands would have drained his small resourees. "Ninety-nine per eent of the Quarter dislikes Stefan Byrd," an linglishman hat said, "hut one per cent adores him." Repeated to Byrd, this utterance was acsepted by him with much complaeenec, for, even more than the averuge man, he prided himself upon his faults of character. His adoration of Paris had not prevented him from critieizing its denizens; the habits of mental withdrawal and reservation developed in his boyhood did not desert him in the city of friendship, but he became more deeply aware of the loneliness which they involved. He searehed eagerly for the few whose rinalities of mind or person lifted thent beyond reach of his demon of disparagement, and he found them, espeeially among women.

To a minority of that sex he was unusually attractive, and he beeane a lover of women, but as subjects for enthusiasm rather than desire. In passion he was curious

18

 THE NEST-BUILDERbut eapricions, seldom rapidly roused, nor long held. In his relations with women emotion came second to mental stimulation, so that he never songlit one whose mere sex was her main attaction. This saved him from muehhe was experienced, but not degraded. Of love, however, in the fused sense of body, mind, and spirit, he knew nothing. Perhaps his work clamed too mueh from him; at any rate he was too cuotistical, too citical and selfsuffieient to give easily. Whether he had received such love he did not ask himself-it is probable that he had, without knowing it, or understanding that he had not himself given full measure in return. The heart of France is praetical; with all her ardor Paris had given Byrd desire and friendship, but not romanee.

In his last year, with only a few frames of his inheritance remaining, Stefan had three pietures in the Beaux Arts. One of these was sold, but the other two importhmed vainly from their hanging places. Enormous mumbers of pictures had been exhibited that year. Every galkery, publie and private, was erowded; Paris was glutted with works of art. Stefan faeed the prospect of speedy starvation the could not dispose of another canvas. He had enough for a summer in Brittany, after whieh, if the deakers conld do nothing for him, he was stranded. Nevertheless, he enjoyed his holiday lightheartedly, confident that his two large pietures could not long fail to be appreciated. Returning to Paris in September, however, he was dismayed to find his favorite dealers uninterested in his eanvases, and disinelined to harbor them longer. Portraits and landseapes, they told him, were in much demand, but fantasies, no. His sweeping groups of rumning, flying figures against stormy skies, or shoals of mermaids hurrying down lanes of the deep sea, did not appenl to the fashionable taste of the year. Something inore languorons, more subdued. or, on the other hand, more "ehie," was demmated.

In a high rage of disgnst, Stefan hired a fincre, and bore his ehildren defiantly home to their birthplace. Sitting in his studio like a ruffled bird upon a spoiled hateding, he reviewed the fact that he lad 32.5 francs in the world, that the rent of his attie was overdue, nud that his pietures had never been so mmarketable as now.

At this point his one intimate man friend, Adolph. Jensen, a Swede, appeared as the deus ex machina. He had, he deelared, an elder brother in New York, an art dealer. This brother had just written him, describing the milhonaires who bought his pietures and lurie-it-lnac. His slop was crowked with them. Adolph's brother was shrewd and hard to please, but let his cher Stefin go himself to New York with his canvases, impress the brother with his brilliance and the beanty of his work, and, undoubtedly, his fortune wonld at once be made. The season in New York was in the winter. Let Stefan go at once, by the fastest boat, and be first in the ficldhe, Adolph, who had a little laid by, would lend him the necessary money, and would write his brother in advanee of the great opportunity he was sending him.

Ultimately, with a very ill grace on Stefan's partwho eould hardly be persuaded that even a temporary return to America was preferalle to starvation-it was so arranged. The second-class passage money was 2.50 franes; for this and ineidentals, he had enongh, and Adolph lent him another 250 to tide him over his arrival. He felt unable to afford adequate crating, so his canvases were unstretehed and made into a roll which he determined should never leave his hands. His clothing was packed in two bags, one contributed by Adolph. Armed with his roll, and followed by his enthnsiastic friend carrying the bagn, Stefan departed from the Gare Saint-Lazare for Dieppe, Liverpool, and the Lusitania.

20

'IUE NEST-BUILDER

Reacting to his friend's optimism, Stefan had felt confident enongh on leaving l'aris, but the diseomforts of the journey had soon flattened his spirits, and now, limp in his berth, he saw the whole adventure mistaken, mureal, and menacing. In leaving the country of his adoption for that of his birth, he now felt that he had put himself again in the clutches of a chimera which had power to wither with its breath all that was rare and beantiful in his life. Nursing a grievance against himself and fate, he at last feil asleep, clothed as he was, and forgot himself for a time in such uneasy slumber as the storin allowed.

IV

THE second-elass deck was rapidly filling. Chairs, rumning in a double row about the deck-honse were receiving bundles of women, rugs, and babies. Encrgetic youths, in surprising ulsters and sweaters, tramped in broken file between these chairs and the bulwarks. Older men, in woolen waistcoats and checked caps, or in the aging black of the small elergy and professional class, obstructed, with a rooted constancy, the few clear corners of the deck. Elderly women, with the parehment skin and dun tailored suit of the "personally conducted" tourist, tied their heads in veils and rentured inte sholfered corners. On the boat-deek a game of shuffeboard was in progress. Above the main companion-way the ship's bands condeseended to a little danee music on behalf of the second elass. The Scotchman, clad in inch-thick heather mixture, was already discussing with all whom he could buttonhole the possibilities of a ship's concert. In a word, it was the third day out, the storm was over, and the passengers were cognizant of life, and of each other.

The Seot had gravitated to a group of men near the smoking-room door, and having reecived from his turtlejawed neighbor of the dinner table, who was among them, the gift of a cigar, interrogated him as to musieal gifts. "I shall recite mesel"," he explained complacently, sneking in his smoke. "Might we hope for a song, now, from you? I've asked yon artist chap, but he says he doesua' sing."

22

THE NEST-BUILDER

His neighbor also disclaimed talents. "Sorry I can't oblige iou. Who wants to hear a man sing, alyway? Where are your girls?"
"There seems to be a singular absence of bonny girrls on board,' replied the Scot, twisting his erect forelock reflectively.
"Haw you asked the English girl?" suggested a tall, rawboned New Englander.
"Which English girrl?" demanded the Seot.
"Listen to him-which! Why, that one over there, you owl."

The Scotchman's eyes followed the gesture toward a group of children surrounding a tall girl who stood by the rail on the leeward side. She was faeing into the wind toward the smoking-room door.
"Eh, mon," said the Seot, "till now I'd only seen the back of yon young woman," and he promptly strode down the deck to ask, and receive, the promise of a song.
Stefan Byrd, after a silent breakfast eaten late to avoid his table companions, had just eome on deek. It had beer misty earlier, but now the sun was beginning to bre: through in sudden glints of brightness. The deek wa: still damp, however, and the whole prospect scemed to the emerging Stefan cheerless in the extreme. His eyes swept the gray, huddled shapes upon the ehairs, the knots of gossiping men, the elumsy, tramping youths, with the same loathing that the whole voyage had hitherto inspired in him. The forelocked Scot, tweed eap in hand, was erossing the deck. "There goes the brute, busy with his infernal concert," he thonght, watching balefully. Then he actually secmed to point, like a dog, limbs fixed, eyes set, his face, with its salient nose, thrust forward.

The Scot was speaking to a tall, bareheaded girl, about whom half a dozen nondescript children erowded. She was holding herself against the wind, and from her long, elcan limbs her woolen dress was whiped, rippling. The sun had gleamed suddenly, and under the shaft of brightness her hair shone back a golden answer. Her eyes, hardly raised to those of the tall Scotehman, were wide, gray, and level-the eyes of Pallas Athene; her features, too, were goddess-like. One hand upon the bulwarks, she seemed, even as she listened, to be poised for flight, balancing to the sway of the ship.

Stefan exhalod a great breath of joy. There was something beautiful upon the ship, after all. He found and li: a cigarette, and squaring his shoulders to the deekhouse wall, leaned back the more comfortably to indulge what he took to be his chief mission-the art of pereciving beauty.

The girl listened in silence tili the Scotchman had finished speaking, and replied briefly and quictly, inclining her head. The Scot, jotting something in a pocket notebook, left her with an air of elation, and she turned again to the children. One, a toddler, was pieking at her skirt. She bent toward him a smile which gave Stefom alnost a stab of satisfaction, it was so gravely swent, so fitted to her person. She stooped lower to speak to the bahy, and the artist saw the free, rhythmic motion which meant developed and untrammeled muscles. Presently the children, wriggling with joy, squatted in a circle, and the girl sank to the deek in their midst with one quick and easy movement, curling her feet under her. There procecded an absurd game. involving a slipper and much squealing, whose intricacics she directed with unrufted ease.

Suddenly the wind puffed the hat of one of the small boys from his head, carrying it high above their reach.

24

'THE NEST-BUILDER

In an instant the girl was up, springing to her feet unaided by hant? or knee. Reaching out, she canght the hat as it descended stantingly over the bulwarks, and was down again before the child's chatehing hands had left .iis head.

A mother, none other than the prominently busted lady of Stefan's talle, blew forward with admiring cries of gratitnde. Other matrons, roeative, surrounded the circle, momentarily cutting off his view. He changed his position to the bulwarks beside the group. There, a yard or tr:o from the gleaming head, he perched on the rail, feet laced into its supports, and continued his coneentrated observation.
"Sce yon chap," remarked the Scot from the smokingroom door to which his talent-sceking romnd of the deek had again bronstht 'iim. "He's fair staring the eyes oot o' his head!'"
"Excerdingly amoying to the young lady, I should imasine," returned his table neighbor, the prim minister, who had joined the group.
"Hoots. she willna' mind the likes of him," seoffed the other, with his booming laugh.

And indeed she did not. Oblivious equally of Byrd and of her more distant watchers, the English girl passed from "Inunt the Slipper" to "A Cold and Frosty Morning," and from that to story-telling, as absorbed as her small eompanions, or as her wateher-in-ehief.

Gradually the sum broke out, the water daneed, huddled shapes began to rise in their chairs, disclosing unexpeeted spots of color-a bright tie or a patterned blouse-animation inereased on all sides, and the ring about the storyteller became three deep.
After a tine a couple of perky young stewards appeared with hage iron trays, contaning thick white eups half full of chicken broth, and piles oi hiscuits. Epon this, the ponter-pigeon lady bore oft her small son to be fed, other mothers did the salne, and the remaining children, at the lure of food, sidled oft of their own aceord, or sped wild: whooping ont promises to return. For the moment, the story-teller was alone. Stefan, seeing the Seet bearing down upon her with two enps of broth in his hand and purpose in his exe, wakened to the danger just in time. Throwing his eigarette overboard, he sprang lightly between her and the approaching menace.
"Won't yon be perfectly kind, and come for a walk?" he asked, stoopiag to where she sit. The girl looked ui) into a pair of green-gold eyes set in a brown, cager face. The face was lighted with a smile of dataling friendliness, and surmounted by an uncovered heal of thick, brownblack hair. Slowly her own cyes showed an answering smile.
"Thank you, I should love to," she said, and rising, swung off beside him, jnst in time-as Stefan mancuvered it-to aroid secing the Scot and his carefully balanced oftering. Discomfited, that indievidal consoled himself with both eups of broth, and bided his time.
"My name is Stefan Byrd. I an a painter, going to America to sell some pictures. I'm twenty-six. What is your name?" said Stefan, who never wasted time in preliminaries and ahhorred small talk-turning his brillime happer smile upou her.
"To answer by the book," she repliea, smiling too, "my name is Mary Elliston. I in twentr-five. I do odd jobs, and am going to Ancrica to try to find one to live on."
"What fun!" cried Stefon, with a fanalike skip of pleasure, as they turned onto the emptier windward deck. "Tlen we re both secking our fortunes."
"Living, rather than fortune, in my case, I'm afraid."
"Well, of course you don't need a fortune, you carry so much gold with you,' and he glanced at her shining hair.
"Not negotiable, mnluekily," she replied, taki ig his compliment as he had paid it, without a trace of self-consciousness.
"Like the sumlight," he answered. "In fact,"-con-fidentially-"I'in afraid you're a thief; you've imprisoned a pioce of the sun, which should belong to us all. However', I 'm not groing to complain to the authorities, I like the result too much. You don thind my saying that, do you?" he eontinued, sure that she did not. "Yon see, I 'm a painter. Color means everything to me-that and form.',
"One never minds hearing niee things, I think," she replied, with a frank smile. They were swinging up and down the windward deek, and as he talked he was acutely aware of her free movements beside him, and of the blow of her skirts to leeward. Her hain, too closely pinned to fly loose, yet seemed to spring from her forehead with the urge of pinioned wings. Life radiated from hor, he thought, with a steady, upward flame-not fitfully, as with most people.
"And one doesn't mind questions, does one-from real people?"' he continued. "I'm going to ask vou lots more, and you may ask me as many as you like. I never talk to people unless they are worth talking to, and then I talk hard. Will you begin, or shall I? I have at least two hundred things to ask.,"
"It is my turn, though, I think." She acceptca him on his own ground, with an open and natural friendliness.
"I have only one at the moment, whith is, 'Why haven't we talked before?"," and she glanced with a quiet humorousness at the few unpromising samples of the seeond cabin whe obstructed the windward deck.
"Oh, good for you!'" he applauded, "aren't they loathly!"
"Oh, no, all right, only not stimulating-_"
"And we are," he finished for her, "so that, obviously, your question has only one answer. We haven t talked before becanse I haven t seen you before, and I haven't seen you because I have been growling in my eabinvoilà tout!"
"Oh, never growl-it's such a waste of time," she answered. "You'll see, the sceond eabin isn't bad.".
"It eertainly isn't, now," rejoied Stefan. "My turn for a question. Have you relatives, or are you, like myself, alone in the world?"
"Quite alone," said Mary, "exeept for a married sister, who hardly eounts, as she 's years older than I, and fearfully preoeeupied with husband, houses, and things." She paused, then added, "She hasn't any babies, or I might have stayed to look after them, but she has lots of money and 'position to keep up,' and so forth."
"I sce her," said Stefan. "Obviously, she takes after the other parent. You are alone then. Next ques-tion-"
"Oh, isn't it my turn again?" Mary interposed, smilingly.
"It is, but I ask you to waive it. You see, questions about me are so comparatively trivial. What sort of work do you do?"

28

TIIE NEST-BUILDER

"Well, I write a little," she replied, "and I've been a foverness ant at empanion. But I'm really a victim of the English method of elucating girls. That's my chicf profession-being a mommment to its incfficieney," and she latuged, low and bell-lik:-
"'Tell me about that-I ve never lived in Eingland," he questioned, with eager interest. ("And oh, Pan and Apollo, her voice!" he thought.)
"Well," she continued, "they bring us up so nice"y that we can't do anything-execpt be niee. I was hrought up in a cathedral town, right in the Close, and my dar old bat, who was a doctor, attended the Bishop, the Dean, and all the Chapter. Mother would not let us :\%0 to boarding-school, for fear of 'influences'-so we had governesses at home, who tanght us nothing we didn't choose to learn. My sistur Isobel married 'well,' as they saty, while I was still in the sehooltoom. Ifer husband belomes to the comut-'
"What's that?" interrupted Stefan.
"Don t yon know what the comity is? How delightfal! The 'comnty' is the county fimilies-landed gentry-very ancient and swagger and all that-much more so than the fitled people often. It was very erreat promotion for the daugliter of one of the town to marry into tie coluty-or would have been exeent that Mother was comity also." She spoke with mock solemnity.
"How delightfinly picturesque and medieval!" exclained Steftin. "The (inctphs and (ihibellines, eli?" "Yes," Mary replicd, "only there is no fend, and it doesn "t sem so romantic when son re in it. The man my sistor married thought was fiohtfully boring except for his family place, and being in the army, which is rather decent. Ile talks," she smiled, "like a phonograph with only one set of records."

MATE-SONG

"Wondrous Being-Wingèd (ioddess-', chanted Stefan, stopping before her and apostrophizing the sly or the boat-deck--"a goddess with a sense of humor!" Snd he positively glowed upon her.
"About the first point I know nothing," she humbed, walking on again beside him, "but for the second," and her face became a little grave, "you have to have some humor if you are a girl in Lindum, or you so under."
"Tell me tell me all about it," he unged. "I 've never met an English girl before, nor a goddess, and I'm so interested!'"

They rested for a time against the bulwarks. The wind was dropping, and the spume seethed ibat ist the hatk side of the ship without foree from the waves to throw it up to them in spray. They looked down into deep blue and green water glassing a sky warm now, a!nd friendly, in which high white cumuli sailed slowly, like full-rigged ships all but beealmed.
"It is a very commonplate story with us," Mary bewinl. "Mother died a little time after Isobel married, and Dad kept my governess on. I berged to go to (iirton, or any other college he liked, but he wouldn't hear of it. Said he wanted a womanly daughter." She smiled rather ruefully. "Dad was doing well with his practice, for a small-town doctor, and had a good deal saved, and a little of mother's money. IIe wanted to have more, so he put it all into rubber. You've heard about rubber, haven't you?" she asked, turning to Stefan.
"Not a thing," he smiled.
"Well, every one in England was putting money into

30

THE NEST'BUILDER

rubber last year, and luts of people did well, but lotsdidn't. Poor ohd Dad didn't-he lost everything. It wouldn't have really mattered-he had his professionbut the shoek killed him, I think; that and being lonely without Mother." She paused a moment, looking into ther witer. "Alyhow, he died, and there was nothing for mes to to "xecep to bergin earning my hiving without any of the necessary equipment."
" What about the brotlier-in-law?" asked Stefan.
"Oh, yes, I eonld have gone to them-I wasn't in danger of starvation. But," she shook her head emphatically, "a poor relation! I couldn 't have stood that."
"Well," he turned spmarely toward her" his clbow on the rail, "I can't help asking this, you know; where were the bachetors of Lindhm?",

She smited, still in her friendly, unembarrassed way.
"I know what you mean, of course. The older men say it quite openly in England.- 'Why don't a nice gel like you get married?'-It's rather a long story." ("Itas she been in love?" Stefan wontered.) "Finst of all, there are very few young men of one's own sort in Lindum: most of them are in the Colonies. Those there are-one or two lawyers, doetors, and squires' sons-are frightfully songht after." Sie m:. w:y face. "Too much eompetition for them, altogether, and-" she seemed to take a plunge before adding- "I ve never been suceessful at bargain count res."

He turned that over for a moment. "I see," he said. "At least I shonld do, if it weren't for it being you. Look here, Niss Elliston, honestly now, fair and square-'" he smiled eonfidingly at her-" you're not asking me to believe that the competition in your case didn't appear in the other sex?"
"Mr. Byrd," she answered straightly, "in my world girls have to have more than a good appearance." She shruged her shoulders mother disdainfully. "I had no money, and I had opinions."
("She's been in love-slightly," he deeided.) "Opinions," he echoed, "what kind? Ilustn't one have any in Lindum?"
"Young girls mustn't-only those they are taught," she reptied. "I read a good deal, I sympathized with the Liberals. I was even-" her voiee dropped to mock hor-ror-" a Suffragist!"
"I've heard ahout that," he interposed eagerly, "thourh the French women don't seem to care much. Yon wanted to vote? Well, why ever not?"

She gave him the briphtest smile he had yet reecived.
"Oh, how nice of you!" she cried. "You really mean that?"
"Couldn 't see it any other way. I've always liked and believed in women more than men. I learnt that in ehildhood," he added, frowning.
"Splendid! I'm so glad," she responded. "You see, with our men it's usmally the o way romd. My ideas were a great handicap at home.
"So you decided to heave?"
"Yes: I went to London and got a job teaching some ehildren sums and history-two hours ewery morning. In the afternoons I worked at stories for the magazines. and placed a few, but they pay an unknown writer horribly badly. I lived with an old lady as companion for two months, but that was being a poor relation mims the relationship-I couldn't stand it. I joined the Suffragists in London-not the Militants-I don't quite see their point of view-and marched in a parade. Brother-thine from Hurn umless I stopreal it." She lathomed yuncty:

$3:$

'THE: N゙ES'T'-BCHIDER

 sively-in Fronch. Than - "Dont ansk me to apologize, Miss l:llistom."
"I won"t." reasindingly. "I liolt rather like that, toon. I wrote that I diblat apert and bling as it was. Then I sat dewn and thonstat ahme the whole question ol women and a few ornaments of Notheres. I love childrem, but I didnt watat to be a empermes. I Wanted to stand inlone in sombe plane where mes hem womlda't be pushed down every time Itrial to mise it. I heliwed in dmerial peo-devoltly. "What magnitient pherk, and how divine of you to trll me it all! Jon be salod me from suiciole, almost. There people immonate me."

"What thmosands of things we can talk about." he went on in a bunct of enthasiasm. "What a perforety splemilid time we are going to have!" Ife all but wardod.
"I hope so." she atiswerd, smilingly, "but there goes the "onge, ant! lin ravenons."
"Dinner!" he eried seornfully; "sulet pulding, all those hombible peoplo- ?on want to leave this-."." He swelt his arm owe the elittering water.
"I don't, but I want my dimer," she maintained.
 ment aremed in latrst npen him.
 must be ficl, or she wombl not wher with sumb divine the henst hamgry. Neverthless, wre will mat, here and now."

She demmered, lat he wonh have his way, thmating stervad, tipped him, and eximed the immediate pmotare tion of two dimmers. Hh misemed liss billiston in some one else's chair, combenimitly parad, suthed her with some onte else's roshions, which he chose from the whole derek the best rue he comble timl. Sile aropped his booty with his spirits to attempt the role of extimgnisher. He sittled himself beside her', and they lmelted delightedly, libe children, on chops and a rice pudding.

V

IT is not too easy to appropriate a pretty girl on board ship. There are always young men who expect the royage to offer a flirtation, and who spend much ingenuity in headintr each other off from the companionship of the most attractive damsels. But the "English girl"' was not in the "pretty" class. She was a beanty, of the grave and pure type which implies character. All the ehildren knew her: all the women and men watched her: bint few of the latter had ventured to speak to her, even before Stefan claimed her as his monopoly. For this he did, from the moment of their first encomnter. To him nobody on the ship existed but her, and he assumed the right to show it.

He had tronble from only two people. One was the Seotehman, McEwan, whose hide seemed impervious to rebufts, and who would charge into a eonversation with the weight of a batteringram, planting himself implacably in a chair beside Miss Elliston, and occasionally reducing even Stefan to silence. The other was Miss Elliston herself. She was kind, she was friendly, she was boyishly frank. Put oecasionally she would withdraw into herself, and sometimes would disappear altogether into her cabin. to be found again, after long search. telling stories to some of the ehildren. On such oceasions Stefan ronmed the decks and saloons very like a hungry wolf, snapping with intoltrable rudeness at any one who spoke to him. This, however, few troubled to do, for he was cordially disliked, both for his own sake and because of his suecess with Miss Elliston. That suceess the ship could not doubt. Though she was invariably polite to every one, she walked and talked only with him or the ehildren. She was, of course, above the social level of the seeond-elass; but this the English did not resent, because they understood it, nor the Americans, because they were unaware of it. On the other hand, English and Amerieans alike resented Byrd, whom they could neither place nor understand. These two beeame the most conspicuous people in the eabin, and their every movement was eagerly watched and discussed, though both remained entircly oblivions to it. Stefan was absorbed in the girl, that was elear; but how far she might be in him the cabin could not be sure. She brightened when he appeared. She liked him, smiled at him, and listened to him. She allowed him to monopolize her. But she never songht him out, never snubbed MeEwan for his intrusions into their tête-ì-têtes, seemed not to be "managing" the affair in any way. Used to more obvious methods, most of the eompany were puzzled. They did not understand that they were watehing the romance of a woman who added perfect breeding to her racial self-control. Mary Elliston would never wear her feelings nakedly, nor allow them to ride her out of hand.

Not so Stefan, who was, as yet unknowingly, experieneing romantic love for the first time. This ginl was the most glorious ereature he had ever known, and the most womanly. Her sex was the very essence of her: she had no need to wear it like a furbelow. She was utterly different from the feminine, adroit women he had known: there was something eool and deep about her like a pool, and withal winged, like the hirds that fly over it. She was marvelous-marvelous! he thought. What a find!

34

 himsilf ar lar. Il a :

 1 hian thr "hallaro."
 Mrlivall, isnit it heantifnl mp hero?" intoposerl Miss Flliston. Mrasimhly.
" 11 is aramb." roplicai tha Srolrhoman, "alnd yo look bommir $i$ " fhe smm." ha' indide simply.
 ing me," she answered smilinely, indicating, with a touch beywrent throll.

 timmily (lamb.

 mindeal rompanliont.

 smilr.
"hook hrore, Mreliwan," sail lre, wilh lhe: rharme of mannor hre know in wrill how fo assumbr, "Jon't mind my irvitahility: I in always likr | hal when | in painting amd right, and it wom't ler lon lompe I ran't possilly paint.
 out. allal lat me linish?"

"Aye, I ken your mairves troulde: yr,'" he replied, lumbering to his feet, "and I'll no disobleege ye, if the leddy will excuse me?' turning to her.

38

THE NEST-BUILDER

Miss Elliston, who had not looked at Stefan since his outburst, murmured her consent, and the Seot departed.

Stefam exploded into a sigh of relicf. "Thank heaven! Isn the maddening?", he exclaimed, reassembling his brushes. "Isn't he the most fatuous idiot that ever escaped from his native menagerie? Did you hear him commence to criticize my work? The oaf! I'm afraid-'" glaneing at her faee-_"that I swore at him, bit he deserved it for butting in like that, and he eouldn't understand what I said." His tone was slightly, very slightly, apologetic.
"I don't think that's the point, is it?" asind the girl, in a very cool voice. She was experiencing her first shock of disappointment in him, and felt unhappy; but she only appeared critical.
"What do you mean?" he asked, dashed.
"Whether he understood or not." She was still looking away from him. "It was so unkind and unnccessary to break out at the poor man like that-and," her voice dropped, "so horribly rude."
"Well," Stefan answered uncomfortably, "I ean't be polite to people like that. I don't even try."
"No, I know you don't. That's what I don't like," Mary replied, cven more coldly. She meant that it hurt leer, obseured the ideal she was eonstructing of him, but she could not have expressed that.

He painted for a few minutes in a silenee that grew more and more constrained. Then he threw down his brush. "Well, I ean't paint," he cexclaimed in an aggrieved tone, "I'm absohtely' ont of tunc. You'll have to realize I'm made like that. I can't ehange, can't hide my real self." As she still did not speak, he added, with an edge to his voice, "I may as well go away; there's nothing I can do here." IIe stood up.

MATE-SONG

"Perhaps you had better,'" she replied, yery quietly. Her throat was aching with hurt, so that she could hardly speak, but to him she appeared indifferent.
"Good-bye," he exclaimed shortly, and strode off.
For some time she remained where he had left her, motionless. She felt very tiral, without knowing why. Presently she went to her cabin and lay down.

Mary did not see Stefan again matil after the midday meal, thongh by the time she appeared on derek he haid been waiting and searching for her for an honr. When he found her it was in an alcove of the lounge. sereened from the observation of the greater part of the room. She was reading, hut as he cime toward her she looked up and closed her book. Before he spolie both knew that their relation to each other had subtly ehanced. They were self-conseious; the hearts of both beat. In a word, their quarrel had tanght them their need of each other.

He took her hame and spoke rather breathlessly.
"I've been looking for you for hours. Thank Cood you're here. I was abominalle to you this morning. Can you possibly forgive me? I'm so horribly lonely withont you.' IIe was extrambinarily handsome as he stood before her, looking distressed, but with his eyes shining.
"Of course I ean," she mummued, while a weight seemed to roll off her heart-and she bhushed, a wonderful pink, up to the eyes.

He sat beside her. still holding hor hand. "I must say it. You are the most beantiful thing in the world. The-most-beautiful!', They looked at each other.

40 TILE NESTR-HUILDER

"Oh!" he exclamed with a long heath, jumping up arain and half pulling her after him in a revnlsion of relief, "rome on deek and let's walk-and talk-or," he langhed exeitedly, "I don't know what 1 shall do next!"
she obeyed, and they almost sped romed the deck, he looking spiritually intoxicated, and she, calm by contrast, but with an inward glow as thongh behind her face a rose was on lire. The deek watehed them and nodded its head. There was no donbt abont it now, every one agreed. Bets bugen to cireulate on the emparement. A fat salesman offered two to one it was declared before they pieked up the Nantncket light. The pursy little passenger snapped an acceptance. "I'll take yon. Here's a dollar says the lady is too partientar." The high-bosomed matron confieded her fears for the happiness of the girl, "who has licen real kind to Johnnie," to the spinster who had admired Stefan the first day out. Gossip was miversal, but through it all the two moved radiant and oblivious.

VI

McEWAN had suceceded in his fell design of getting up a concert, and the event was to take place that night. Miss Elliston, who had promised to sing, went below a little carlier than usual to dress for dinner. Byrd had tried to dissuade her from taking part, but she was firm.
"It's a frightful bother," she said, "but I can't get out of it. I promised Mr. McEwan, you know."
"I won't say any further what I think of MeEwan," replied Stefin, laughing. "Instead, I'll heap eoals of fire on him by not trying any longer to persuade you to turn him down."

As she left, Stefan waved her a gay "Grand suceès!" but he was already prey to an agony of nevousness. Suppose she didn't make a suecess, or-worse still-suppose she did make a suceess--by singing bad musie! Suppose she lacked art in what she did! She was perfection; he was terrified lest her singing should not be. His fastidious brain tortured him, for it told him he would love her less completely if she failed.

Like most artists, Stefan adored musie, and, more than most, understood it. Suppose-just suppose-she were to sing Tosti's "Good-bye!" IIe shuddered. Yet, if she did not sing something of that sort, it would fall flat, and she would be disappointed. So he tortuced himself all through dinner, at which he did not see her, for he had been unable to get his place changed to the first sit-

42

 TIIE NEST'BUII.INHRtimg with hers. Ho longed to kerep natay from the con-

 Ho hat not at firs dremmed of dressimes, bime many of the wher men hatd dome so, and hed detrmined that lor heve salk he must play Ho gatue at heast to that extent. Byed added the seorn of the artist to the romstithtiomat dislike lhis, howerer, was as little combentional as pessible, and While he meronsly aldinsted it he conld not help rexogizain!: that it was axerediansly heoming. Ho fore at tie and destoned two collars. howeres. before the result satistiod hims, and his moves wow at haping piteh when stamealo chods upent the piamo ambumbed that the comeret had begime. He fombla siat in the finthes romer of the saloon, alld watitel, pombiling forerish dirdes neon the Maly Plliston's name was fombth on the program, alld came immediatcle after Mcelvall s, who was down for a "rewitation." Stofan mimatere to sit thronght the piamosolo and a song her a somple lithe limplish batritone aboun "the rolling dep." But when the seot begint to hate ont. with tremembens velnemence. what purported to he a porm he sir Wialter seott. Stafim, his forehead and hamels damp with horrore comble endme no more, and flod, mashinge his way throurg the crowd at the door. We dimbed to the depk and wated there, listeming apprehernsivel: When the seattered applanse warmed him that the time for Marys somg had come. he found himself uttorly mable to face the saloon arain. Fortunately the thain eompanimatay gave of a well opening diverty over Hor sahoml: allil it was l'rom thre ratime of this wrill that shlath saw Mary, just as the pianm sommen the oproning hals.

Sherestond full under Hor brilliant bidhes in at gewn of partorl, and quite rasily, in lull, "foar tomes that struck He: wery rather of the motes, she began to simg. "reotel thime that romblat ofre hawe satisfied him and phonsed tress minn-" They pulserl with happy heve. Therer times simple: but with sume art and ferling. As the hast motes her coiat, allel momered beside ber to the boat deek. Not matil they stord sidn by side: at the rail, ant she turned furstionillety 'owaril hime, dial he sperak.

"You wrer perfect, wihont flaw. I can't trll you--" he broke off", worlless.
"l'm so ghad-glad that you wre phased," she whispered.

They hant side be side over the bulwarks. They wer quite alone, and the mom was rising. There are always liberating moments at sea when the spirit seems to gro -

44

 "hill the riding mown piowed with a swalde of living rombl here allal thor kiswerl.

 hor. Mary. 'The ouly mine whese beanty has heroll so di-her and timling yon."

This thrillol inre with all ahe of mother-pity. She mont his falles anm all combloned-sher saw then only as the fraits of hi - meliness.

 of all hames. Porls amd painters have ghorified it int "were agre but bum as I shall do', and he kissed her adorin:ly:

Again, he held his chorek to hers. "Beloved." he whispered. "when we are married" (even as he spoker he marroded at himsilf that the word shomble come so maturall.! 'I want to paint you as you really are-a goddess of bealuty and love."
 Hltorl. Stle wne his, Ilforly:

 Warlal him. linl here vision, lemhing onl his hrolt, waz of finker's ol' it lillle chilel.

Vií

T

 rombinm till stofans piothes wow sold. till they hat Stefall, who was cmomomsly malder her inllomere, and at ahberss. listomed at liest without demme. Dher heak-plate of a late comare at her tahbe after mentiation with the steward, his impationt temperament asserterl itsidf in a hurst.
"Wearest ome." hererid. when they were comfortably setthel in their farorite comer of the batat derk, "listm! 1 in sure we re all wrong. 1 know we are. Why shomble rou and - -" and he took her hand - "wait and plan and some ourselves as little people do? We be both got to live, hatem't we? And we are going to live; yon don't expedt we shall starve, do you?"

She shook her head, smiling.
"Well, then," trimmphantly, "why shouldn't we live together? Why, it would be ahsurd not to, even from the base and practical point of view. Think of the saving! One rent instead of two-one everything instead of two!" His arm gave her a quick pressure.
"Yes, but-" she demurret.

He turuel on here smblinly. "Yom don'I want Io wait, do you?" lar expmistulatord.
"No, of comese mot, lowlish ome," she: lamehed.

Sloe romld mot, nuswer-anill hardly formilate the mollertion of she khew mot what small homsiohold grots. It was is if sle wisholl to makr lair a pare to mem ise her not sprak lo hime of the vision of the ling hannl.

"You're hrame, Mary. Your combage was one of the things I most bowel in som. Lat is be beave torellar!" His smite was irmsistibly herpe.

She: ronld wot bear that her slomblat dowh her momrame, and she wambed passionathly mo to takr that smita from his fiace. Slar began to waken.
"Mary," he crime fired hy the instimet (o) make the yon abmint my piatures. I kuow thoy are wom-I know I can sell them in New York. IBut let's mot wait for that. Leet's hime ourshers together hefont we put our fortumes to the touch! Then we shall be one, whatever happens. We shall have that." Ite kiswd hrer, sming her half won.
"You've got five humderd dollars, I ve ouly got fifty, but the pictmres are worth thomsamls," her went ont rapidly. "We can have a woudurful werk in the comntry somewhere, and have plenty left to lise on while I'm negotiating the sale. Even at the worst," he exulted, "I'm stronir. I can work at anthing-with you! I don't mind asking you to spend your money, sweetheart, beeause I know my things are worth it five times over." She was rather breathless by this time. He pressed his advantage, holding lier elose.
"Beloved, I've found you. Suppose I lost you! Suppose, when you were somewhere in the city without me, you got run over or something." Even as she was, strained to him, she saw the horror that the thought conjured in his eyes, and touehed his eheek with her hand, protectingly.
"No," he pleaded, "don't let us run any risks with our wonderful happiness, don't let us ever leave each other!" He looked imploringly at her.

She saw that for Stefan what he urged was right. Her love drew her to him, and upon its altar she laid her own retarding instinct in happy sacrifice. She drew his head to hers, and holding his face in the cup of her ? inds, kissed him with an almost solemn tenderness. This was her surrender. She took upon herself the burden of his happiness, even as she yielded to her own. It was a saerament. He saw it only as a response.

Later in the day Stefan sought out the New England spinster, Miss Mason, who sat opposite to him at table. IIe had entirely ignored her hitherto, but he remembered hearing her talk familiarly about New York, and his male instinet told him that in her he would find a ready confidante. Such she proved, and a most flattered and delighted one. Moreover she proffered all the information and assistanee he desircd. She had moved from Boston five years ago, she said, and shared a flat with a widowed sister untown. If they doeked that night Miss Elliston could spend it with them. The best and eheapest plaees to go to near the city, she assured him, were on Long Island. She mentioned one where she had spent a month, a tiny village of summer bungalows on the Sound, with one small but comfortable inn. Questioned further, she was sure this inn would be nearly empty, but not elosed, now in mid-September. She was evidently practical, and pathetically eager to help.

Unwilling to stay his plans, however, on such a feeble prop, Byrd hunted up the minister, whom he took to be a trifle less plebeian than most of the men, and obtained from him an endorsenent of Miss Mason's views. The man of God, though stiff, was too eonseientious to be unforgiving, and on receiving Stefan's explanation congratulated him sincerely, if with restraint. He did not know Shadeham personally, he explained, but he knew similar places, and doubted if Byrd could do better.

Mary, all enthusiasm now that her mind was made up, was enehanted at the prospeet of a tiny seaside village $\therefore$ or their honeymoon. In gratitude slie made herself charming to Miss Mason until Stefan, impatient every $m$ ment that he was not with her, bore her away.
'They doeked at eight o'clock that night. Stefan saw Mary and Miss Mason to the door of their flat, and would have lingered with them, but they were both tired with the long proeess of eustoms inspection. Moreover, Mary said that she wanted to sleep well so as to look "very niee' ' for him to-morrow.
"Imperturbable divinity!" admired Stefan, in moek amazement. "I shall not sleep at all. I am far too happy; but to you, what is a mere marriage?"

The jest hurt her a little, and seeing it, he was quick with loverlike recompense. They parted on a note of deep tenderness. He lay sleepless, as he had prophesied, at the nearest cheap hotel, companioned by visions at once eagerly masculine and poetically exalted. Mary slept fitfully, but sweetly.

The next morning they were married. Stefan's first idea had been the City Hall, as offering the most expeditious method, but Mary had been firm for a church. A sight of the nunicipal authorities from whom they obtained their license made of Stefan an enthusiastic convert to her view. " $A$ !l the ugliness and none of the dignity of democracy," he snorted as they left the building. They found a not unlovely church, half stifled between tall buildings, and were married by a curate whose reading of the service was sufficiently reverent. For a wedding ring Mary had that of Stefan's mother, drawn from his little finger.

By late afternoon they were in Shadeham, ensconced in a small wooden hotel facing a silent beach and low cliffs shaded with scrub-oak. The house was clean, and empty of other guests, and they were given a pleasant room overlooking the water. From its windows they watched the moon rise over the sea as they liad watched her two nights before on deck. She was the silver witness to their nuptials.

PART II  MATED

I

MARY found Stefan an ideal lover. Their marriage, entered into with such headlong adventurousncss, secmed to unfold daily into more perfect bloom. The difficulties of his temperament, whieh had been thrown into sharp relicf by the crowded life of shipboard, smoothed themselves away at the toueh of happiness and peaee. No woman, Mary realized, could wish for a fuller cup of joy than Stcfan offered her in these first days of their mating. She was amazed at herself, at the suddenness with which love had transmuted her, at the ease with whieh she adjusted herself to this new world. She found it diffieult to remember what kind of life she had led before her marriage-hardly could she believe that she had ever lived at all.

As for Stefan, he wasted no moments in backward glances. He neither remembered the past nor questioned the future, but immersed himself utterly in his present "oy with an abandonment he ${ }^{7}$ d never experienced save in painting. Questioned, he would have scoffed at the idca that life for him could ever hold more than his work, and Mary.

Thus absorbed, Stefan would have allowed the days to slip into weeks uncounted. But on the ninth day Mary, incapable of a wholly carefree attitude, reminded him that they had planned only a week of holiday.
"Let's stay a month," he replied promptly.

THE NEST-BUILDER

But Mary had been questioning her landlord about New York.
"It appears," she explained, "that every one moves on the first of October, and that if one hasn't found a studio by then, it is almost impossible to get one. He says he has heard all the artists live round about Washington $\mathbf{S q u a r e}$, but that even there rents are fearfully high. It's at the foot of Fifth Avenue, he says, which sounds very fashionable to me, but he explains it is too far 'down town.' "
"Yes, Fifth A venue is the great street, I understand," said Stefan, "and my dealer's address is on Fourth, so he's in a very grod neighborhood. I don't know that I should like Washington Square-it somrds so patriotic." "Fanatie!" langhed Mary. "Wrell, whether we go there or not, it's evident we must get back before October the first, and it's now September the twenty-fourth."
"Angel, don't. let's be mathematical," he replied, pinching the lobe of her ear, which he had proclained to be entrancingly pretty. "I ean't add; tell me the day we have to leave, and on that day we will go."
"Tliree days from now, then," and she sighed.
"Oh, no! Not only three more days of heaven, Mary?',
"It will hurt dreadfully to leave," she agreed, "but," and she nestled to him, "it won't be any less heaven there, will it, dearest?"

This spurred him to reassurance. "Of course not," he responded, quickly summoning new possibilities of delight. "Imagine it, wou haven't even see.. my pictures yet." They had left them, rolled, at Miss Mason's. "And I want to paint you-really paint you-not just silly little sketeles and heads, but a big thing that I can only do in a studio. Oh, darling, think of a studio with you to sit to me! How I shall work!'" His imarination was fired; instantly he was ready to paek and leave.

MATED

But they had their three days more, in the golden light of the Indian summer. Three more swins, in which Stefan eould barely join for joy of wateling her long lines eutting the water in her close English bathing dress. Three more evening walks along the shimmering sands. Three more nights in their moon-haunted room within sound of the slow splash of the waves. And, poignant with the sadness of a nearing ehange, these days were to Mary the most exquisite of all.

Their journey to the eity, on the lithle, gritty, perpetually stopping train was made joeund by the lively antieipations of Stefan, who was in a mood of high eonfidenee.

They had deeided from the first to try their fortunes in New York that winter; not to return to Paris till they had established a sure market for Stefan's work. He had haleyon plans. Masterpieees were to be painted under the inspiration of Mary's presenee. His suceess in the Beaux Arts would be an Opell Sesame to the dealers, and they would at once become prosperous,-for he had the exaggerated eontinental indea of Ameriean prices. In the spring they would return to Paris, so that Mary should see it first at its most beautiful. There they would have a studio, naking it their eenter, but they would also travel.
"Spain, Italy, Grecee, Mary-we will see all the world's masterpieces together," he jubilated. "You shall be my wander-bride." And he sang lier little snatehes of gay song, in Freneh and Italian, thrumming an imaginary guitar or making eastanets of his fingers.

56

THE NEST-BUILDER

"I will paint you on the Acropolis, Mary, a new Pallas to guard the Parthenon." His imagination leapt from vista to vista of the future, each opening to new delights. Mary's followed, lured, dazzled, a little hesitant. Her own visions, unformulated though they were, seemed of somewhat different stuff, but she saw he could not conceive them other than his, and yielded her doubts happily.

At the Pennsylvania Station they took a taxicab, telling the driver they wanted a hotel near Washington Square. The amount registered on the meter gave Mary an apprehensive elinll, but Stefan paid it carelessly. A moment later he was in raptures, for, quite unexpectedly, they found themselves in a Freneh hotel.
"What wonderful lnek-what a good omen!" he cried. "Mary, it's almost like Paris!" and he broke into rapid gesticulating talk with the desk clerk. Soon they were installed in a bright little room with Frenel prints on the walls, a gay old-fashioned wall paper and patterned curtains. Stefan assured her it was extraordinarily cheap for New York. While she freshened her face and hair he dashed downstairs, ignoring the elevator-whieh seemed to exist there only as an American afterthought -in search of a paeket of French cigarettes. Finding them, he was completely in his element, and loant over the desk puffing luxuriously, to engage the clerk in further talk. From him he obtained advice as to the possibilities of the neighborhood in respect of studios, and armed with this, 1 rded up the stairs again to Mary. Presently, fortificd a pot of tea and delicious French rolls, they sallied out on their quest.
That afternoon they diseovered two vacant studios. One was on a top flour on Washington Square South, a big room with bathroom and kitehenctte attached and a small bedroom opening into it. The other was an attic just off the Square. It had water, but no bathroom, was heated only by $n$ open fire, and consisted of one large room with sufficient light, and a large closet in which was a single pane of glass high up. The studio contained an abandoned model throne, the closet a gas ring and a sink. The rent of the first apartment was sixty dollars a month; of the seeond, twenty-five. Both were approached by a dark staircase, but in one case there was a carpet, in the other the stairs were bare, dirty, and creaking, while from depths below was wafted an unmistakable odor of onions and eats.

Mary, whose father's rambling sumy house in Lindum with its Elizabethan paneling and carvings had been considered dear at ninety pounds a year, was staggered at the price of these mean garrets, the better of whieh she felt to be quite beyond their reaeh. Even Stefan was a little dashed, but was confident that after his interview with Adolph's brother sixty dullars would appear less formidable.
"You should have seen my attic in Paris, Mary-absolutely falling to pieces-but then I didn't mind, not having a goddess to house," and he pressed her arm. "For you there should be something spacious and bright enough to be a fitting background." He glanced up a little ruefully at the squalid house they had just left.
But she was quick to reassure him, her courage mounting to sustain his. "We eould manage perfcetly well in the smaller place for a time, dearest, and how lueky we don't have to take a lease, as we should in England." Her mind jumped to perceive any practical advantage.

 fors shepomber

 hanses. :llul :

 air of pationt hamblandes.
 ha hat mistak'ol the mombor.
 plided the man in a tomotoss roice.

At the name the gray face thelled pathetieally. Jen-propel into stalin is Raw． low it is．＂

 ing his hands larethere impolatly，＂lone bl its wealth，

 old farer showed ant expression at one pealing and dior niliarl．
＂I dint dean what I wrote would do any harm， Mr．Pixel，but，now of come you will have to explain 10 A小川ph－？＂

Stream，bowel th s！ot thy，helle out his hand．
＂look hare，draseln，！mi＇ir put me in an awful hoke， worse than you knows．But why shomlal say amylhines？ Lat．Adolph think were both millionaires，＇and he grimed ruefully！

60

THE NES'T-BUILDER

Jensen straghtened and took the proffered hand in oue that trembled. "Thamk you," he said, and his eyes ghistemed. "I'm grateful. If there were only something I romid do-'"
"Well, give me the mames of some dealers," said Stofan, to whom scenes were expuisitely ombarrassing, anxions to be gone.
densen wrote several names on a smmdged half sheret of puper. "These are the best. Iry them. My introduction wouldn't help, I'm af raid," bitterly.

On that Stefin loft him, harrying with relief from the unsty atmospinere of failure into the busy streat. Though half darad by the sudden subsidence of his plans, mulbe to face as yet the possible consenuenees, he had his pietures, and the names of the real dealers; confidence still buoyed him.

II

THREE hours later Mary, anxionsly waitin: heard Stefan's step approach their bedrumin door. Lustantly her heart drophed like teat. She did not need his voice to tell her what thone dray. ging feet anounced. She sprang to the door and hand har arms romid his neek before he could speali she to $k$ the hary roll of canvases from him ant half Pudher: hime into the room's one comfortable arme-chair. Kheeting hesite him, she pressed her check to his, stroking hates his heat-danped hair. "Darling," she saild, "you are tired to death. Don't tell min a'out your day till you've rested a little."
He elosed his eyes, leaning isfored exhausted; every line of his face domen ate of his tan, it was pale, with hollow: : It was extraordinary that a few hol !............. such a change, sle thought, and held him ......................
He did not speak for a long time, w.............ary," he said, in a tlat voiee, " 1 've liad a somplete failure. Nobody wants my things. This is what I've let you in for." His tone had the indifferent quality of extreme fatigue, but Mury was not deeeived. She knew that his whole being eraved reassurance, rehabilitation in its own eyes.
"Why, you old foolish darling, you're too tired to know what you're talking about," she eried, kissing him. "Wait till you've had something to eat." She rang the bell-four times for the waiter, as the eard over it instructed her. "Failure indeed!" she went on, clearing a small table, "there's no such word! One doesn't grow rich in a day, you know." She mored silently and quickly about, hung up his hat, stood the eanveases in a corner, ordered coffee, rolls and egoss, and finally unlaced Stefan's shoes in spite of his rather horrified if feeble protest.

THE NEST-BUILDER

Not until she had watched him drink two cups of eoffee and devour the food-she guessed he had had no lunch-did she allow him to talk, first lightiner his eigrarette and finding a place for herself on the arm of his chair. By this time Stefan's extreme lassitude, and with it his despair, had vanished. IIe brightened pereeptibly. "You wonder," he exclaimed, eatching her hand and kissing it, "now I can tell you about it." With his arm about her he deseribed all his experienees, the fiaseo of the Jensen affilir and his subsequent interviews with Fini Avenue deaters. "They are all Jews, Mary. Some are decent enough fellows, I suppose, thongh I hate the Israelites!" ('Silly boy!" she interposed.) "Others are horrors. None of them want the work of an American. Old masters, or well known foreigners, they say. I explained my success at the Beamx Arts. Two of them had seen my name $;$ the Paris papers, but said it would mean nothing to their elients. Hopeless Philistines, all of them! I do believe I should have had a hetter chance if I'd called myself Ausirim, instead of American, and I only revived my American citizenship because I thought it would be am asset!" He laughed, ironically. "They advised me to have a oneman show, late in the winter, so as to get publicity."
"So we will then," iuterposed Mary coufidently.

MATED

"Good Lord, child,' he exclaimed, half irritably, "you don't suppose I eould have a gallery for nothing, do you? God knows what it would eost. Besides, I haven't enough pictures-and think of the frames!" He sat up, fretfully.

She saw his nerves were on edge, and quickly offered a diversion. "Stefan," she cried, jumping to her feet and throwing her arms back with a gesture the grace of which did not eseape him even in his impatient mond, "I haven't even seen the pictures yet, you know, and can't wait any longer. Let me look at them now, and then I'll tell you just how idiotie those dealers were!" and she gave her bell-like langh. "I'll undo them." Her fingers were busy at the knots.
"I hate the sight of that roll," said Stefan, frowning. "Still-" and he jumped up. "I do immensely want you to see them. I know you'll understand them." Suddenly he was all earerness agrain. He took the canvases from her, mudid them and, easting aside the smaller ones, spread the two largest against the wall, propping their eorners adroitly with chairs, an umbrella, and a walking stick. "Don't look yet," he called meanwhile. "Close your eycs." He moved with agile speed, instinctively finding the best light and thrusting back the furniture to seeure a elearer view. "There!" he cried. "Wait a minute-stand here. Now look!" trimmphantly.

Mary opened her eyes. "Why, Stefim, they're wonderful!" she exelaimed. But even as she spoke, and amidst her sincere admiration, her heart, very slightly, sank. She knew enough of painting to see that here was genins. The two fantasies, one representing the spirits of a wind-storm, the other a mermaid fleening a mer-

64

 THE NEST'BUILDERman's grasp, wew brilliant in eolor, line und conception. They were things of hanty, but it was a beanty stramge, menacing, subhmman. The figures that fore throngh the chomels mged on the storm with a wieked frightomed her; it "ats repellent in its likeness at onee to a tish and al man. The mermaid st fare was less inhoman, but it was stricken with a horrid terors. Sho Was swimming straght out of the pieture as if to fling herself, shmiking. into the satfere of the spectator's ams. The pidures were imaginative powernl, aresting but they were not Masing. Fiow people, she felt, wonld eare to live with them. Dfere a long sernting she themed to her hashand. at moer glorying in the strength of his talent amel tronbled by its phality.
"Yon arte a momins, Ntofam," she said.
"Youm really like them?" he asked nagerv.
"I think they are wonderf"ul!" He was satisfied, for it was her heart, not her roide that held a reservation. Stefan showed her the smaller vimases some 13 finishod. dost were of momphs and winged ches, but there were there lamiseapes. Onde of these, a stremereflecting a high spring sky between bamks of yomg meadow grass, showed a litte famm skipping memily in the distance. The atmosphere was indeseribably lighthearted. Dane smild as she looked at it. The other two were empty of tigmes: they were delicately graceful and alluring, but there was something lacking in them -What, she could not tell. She liked best a sketeh of a baby boy, lost amid trees, behind which wood-uymphs and fams peoped at him, rognish and inquisitive. The boy was seated on the ground, fat and solemn, with round, tear-wet pyes. Hr was so Ioncly that Mary wanted to hmer him; insteat, she kissed stefam.
"What a durk of a baby, doarest!" she exelaimed.
"Yes, he was a miee kid betonged to my eonciereme", he answered ramelresty. "Thar piphore is semtimental, thomsh. 'This is bettre,' and her pointed to another mermainl stmely.
"Yes, it's splemplid," she amswered, instimetively suppressimg a sigh. Shor began to malize a lithe what at strampe being she had married. With an impulsive need of protertion she held him "lose, hilling her fare in his meres. 'Ther reality of his arms reassured here.

That day they derided, at Mary's mresing, to take the smatler stmblo at onere, abmatoming the extravasanes of hotel life. In practical mammers she was already assmming a keadership which he wis ghal to follow. She sugerested that in the monnimg he shomblat tare his smathere canvasis, and try some of the less important deaters, while she matre an expedition in suarel of neressary furniture. To this he rawerly agrerel.
"It seems horrible to let seme do it alone, but it womble be sarrilogions to disense the prier of sameepans with a goddess," he explained. "Are you sure your can fine the tedimm?"
"Why, I shall love it!" she eried, astonished at such an expression.

He regarded her whimsically. "fienins of efficiency, then I shall leave it to yom. Such things appal me. In Paris, my garret was furmished only with pictures. I inherited the bed from the last ocerupant, aml I think Adolph insisted on finding a pillow and a frying-pan. He used to come up and cook for us both sometimes, when he thought I had been eating too often at restaurants. He approved of ceonomy, did Adolph." Stefan was lounging on the bed, with his perpetual eigarette.

66

THE NEST-BUILDER

"He must be a dear," said Mary. She had begun to make a shopping list. "Tell me, absurd ereature, what you really need in the studio. There is a model throne, you will remember."
"Oh, I'll get my own easel and stool," he replied quiekly. "There's nothing else, except of course a table for my paints. A good solid one," he added with emphasis. "I'll tell you what," and he sat up. "I go out early to-morrow on my dealer hunt. I foree myself to stay out until late afternoon. When I return, behold! The goddess has waved her hand, and invisible min-ions--" he cireled the air with his eigarette-"have transported her temple across the square. There she sits enthroned, waiting for her acolyte. How will that do?" He turned his radiant smile on her.
"splendid," she answered, amused. "I only hope the goddess won't get chipped in the passage."

She thought of the dusty studio, of bromms and seruhbing brushes, but she was already wise enough in wifelore not to mention them. Mary eane of a race whose women had always served their men. It did not seem strange to her, as it might have to an American, that the whole ? abor of their installation should devolve on her.

With ler back turned to him, she counted over theil resources, caleulating what wonld be available when their hotel bill was paid. Exeept for a dollar or two, Stefan had turned his small hoard over to her. "It's all yours anyway, dearest," he had said, "and I don't want to spend a eent til! I have made something." They had spent very little so far: she was relieved to realize that the five hmodred dollars remained almost intaet. While Stefan continued to smoke haxurionsly on the bed, she jotted down firures, apportioning one hundred and fifty dollars for six months' rent, and trying to calenlate a weekly basis for their living expenses. She kirew that they were both equally ignorant of prices in New York, and determined to call in the assistanee of Miss Mason.

MATED

"Stefan," she s:id, taking up the telephone, "I'm going to summon a minion." She explaned to Miss Mason over the wire. "We are starting honsekeeping to-morrow, and I know absolutely nothing about where to shop, or what things ought to cost. Would it be making too great demands on yonr kinduess if I asked yon to mect me here to-morrow morning and join me in a shoppinge expedition?',

The rerquest, delivered in her civil English voice, enchanted Miss Mason, who had to obtain all her romance vicarionsly. "I should just love to!" she exclained, and it was arranged.

Mary then telephoned that they would take the studio -a technicality which she knew Stefan had entirely forgotten-and notified the hotel offee that their room would be given up nest morning.
"O thou above rubies and precious pearls!" chanted Stefan from the bed.

After dinner they sat in Washington Square. Their ntirriage moon was waning, but still shone high and bright. I'rder her the trees appeared ctherealized, and her light mingled in magie contest with the white beans of the are lamps near the arch. Above each of these, a miryiad tiny moths fluttered their desirous wings. Unider the trees Italian couples wandered, the men with dark amorous glanees, the girls langhing, their neeks gay with eolored shawls. Brightly ribboned ehildren, black-haired, played about the benehes where their mothers gossiped. There was enchantment in the tired but cooling air.

68 THE NEST-BUILDER

Stefan was enthusiastie. "Look at the types, Mary! The whole place is utterly foreign, full of ardor and eolor. I have cursed America without eause-here I can feel at home." To her it was all alien, but her heart responded to his happiness.

On the bench next them sat a group of Italian women. From this a tiny boy detaehed limself, plump and serions, and, urged by euriosity, gradually approached Mary, his velvet eyes fixed on her face. She lifted him, resistless, to her knee, and he sat there contentedly, sueking a colored stiek of eandy.
"Look, Stefan!" she eried; "isn't he a lamb?"
Stefan east a eritical glance at the baby. "IIe's paintable, but horribly stieky," he said. "Let's move on before he begins to yell. I want to see the effeet from the roadway of these shifting groups under the trees. It might be worth doing, don't you think?' and he stood up.

His manner slightly rebuffed Mary, who would gladly have mursed the little boy longer. However, she gently lowered lim and, rising, moved off in silence with Stefan, who was ignorant of any offense. The rest of their outing passed sweetly enough, as they wandered, arm in arm, about the square.

III

THE next morning Stefan started immediately after his premier déjeuner of rolls and coffee in quest of the less important dealers, taking with him only his smaller eauvases. "I'll stay away till five o'cloek, not a minute longer,'" he admonished. Mary, still seated in the dining-room over her English bacon and eggs-she had smilingly declined to adopt his French method of breakfasting-glowed aequiesecuee, and offered him a parting suggestion.
"Be sure to show then the baby in the wood."
"Why that one?" lie questioned. "You admit it isn't the best."
"Perhaps, but neither are they the best connoisseurs. You'll sec." She nodded wisely at him.
"The oracle has spoken-I will obey," he called from the door, kissing his fingers to her. She ventured an answering gesture, knowing the room empty save for waiters. She was almost as unselfconscious as he, but had her nation's slrinking from any public expression of emotion.

Hardly had he gone when the faithful Miss Mason arrived, her mild eyes almost youtlfful with enthusiasm. From a blaek satin reticule of dimensions beyond all proportion to her meager self she drew a list of names on which she diseoursed volubly white Mary finished her breakfast.

70 THE NEST-ISUILDER

"You'll get most everything at this first place," she said. "It's pretty near the biggest department store in the city, and only two boeks from hero-ain't that renvenient? Yon can deal there right along for everything in the way of dry gooks."

Mary had no conception of what either a department store or clry goods might be, but determined not to confound her mentor by a display of such ignorinnee.
"Scemed to me, though, you might get some things second hand, so I got a list of likely places from my sister. who's lived in New York longer'n I have. I thourht meble-" her tone was tactful-'yon didn't want to waste your money any?"

Mary was impressed again, as she had been before her wedding, by the natnal good mamers: of this simple and half edneated woman. "Why is it," she wondered to herself, "that one wonld not dream of knowing people of her elass at home, but rather likes them here?" she did not realize as yet that for Miss Mason no classes existed, and that consequently she was as much at ease with Mary, whase mother hanl been "comity," as she wonld be with her own eolored "help."
"Yon gnessed quite rightly, Miss Mason," Mary smiled. "I want to spund as little as possible, and shall depend on yon to prevait my making mistakes."
"I reekon I know all there is t' know 'bont economy." nodded Miss Mason, mul, as if hy way of illustration, drew from her hag a pair of entton gloves, for which she exchanged her kid ones, rolling these earefully awiy. "They get real massel shopping," she explained.

Within half an hour, Nany realized that she wonld have heen lost indeed without her gride. First they inspected the studio. Mary had had a varue idea of cleaning it herself, but Miss Mason demanded to see the janitress, and ascended, after a ten minutes' emersion in the uoisome gloom of the basement, in high satisfaction. "She's a dago," she reported, "but not so dirty as some, and looks a husky worker. It's her business to clean the flats for new temants, but I promised her fifty cents to get the place done by non, wimlows and all. She seemed real pleased. She says her husband will carry your coal up from the cella: for a puarter a week; I guess it will he worth it to yous. You don't want to give the money to him thong!,", she almonished, "the woman runs everything. I slouldn't eale'late," she sniffed, "he does more'n a couple of real days' work a month. They mostly don't."

So the first prohlem was solved, and it was the same with all the rest. Many dollars did Miss Mason save the Byrds that day. Mary would have bought a bedstead and sereened it, but her eompanion pointed out the extravaganee and ineonvenience of such a course, and initiated her forthwith into the main seeret of New York's apartment life.
"You'll want your divan new," she said, and led her in the great department store to a hideous object of gilded iron which opened into a donble bed, and closed into a divan. At first Mary rejected thi andactased machine unequivocally, but beeame a coniat when Miss Mason showed her how eretome ishe pronusa!ed it "crecton'") or rugs would soften its nakedness 1:) dignity, and how bed-clothes and pillows were sw:lloped i, its maw by day to be released when the studis became a sleeping room at night.
These trappings they purchased at first hamd, and obliging salesmen promised Niss Mason with their lips,

72

THE NEST-BUILDER

but Mary with their eyes, that they should go out on the noon delivery. For other things, however, the two searched the second-hand stores which stand in that district like logs in a stream, staying abandoned particles of the city's ever moving eurrent. Here they bought a high, roomy chest of drawers of painted pine, a Morris ehair, three single chairs, and a sturdy folding table in eherry, quite old, which Mary felt to be a "find," and which she destined for Stefan's paints. Miss Mason reconmended a "rocker," and Mary, who had had visions of stuffed English easy chairs, acquieseed on finding in the rocker and Morris types the only available combinations of cheapness and comfort. A seeond smaller table of good design, two brass candlestieks, and a little looking-glass in faded greenish gilt, rejoiced Mary's heart, without unreasonably lightening her pocket. During these purchases Miss Mason's authority paled, but she reasserted herself on the question of iceboxes. One dealer's showroom was half full of them, and Miss Mason pounced on a small one, little used, marked six dollars. "That's real eheap-you couldn't do better-it's a good make, too." Mary had never seen an ice-box in her life, and said so, striking Miss Mason alnost dumb.
"I'm sure we shouldn't need such a thing," she demurred.

Recovering speceh, Miss Mason launehed into the ereed of the iee-box-its ubiquity, values and economies. Mary understood sle was receiving her second initiation into flat life, and mentally bracketed this new eult with that of the divan.
"All right, Miss Mason. In Rome, et cetera," she capitulated, and paid for the ice-box.

Thanks to her frioul, their shopping had been so expeditions that the day was still young. Mury was fired by the determination to have some sort of nest for her tied and probably disheartemed hastand to return to into the scheme. 'The transportation of their scattered purchases was the main dimienty, but it yidhed to the lifle spinsteres mspiration. A list of their performances between noon amd five odedoek would read like the deseription of a Presidentinl ramdidatois day. They dashed back to the studio and reassured themselves us to the labors of the janitresis. Jiss Mason momerthed the lurking lonshand, and demambed of him a fricod and a hamd-cart. These she galvanized him inte producing on the spot, and sont the pair offi armerl with a list of goons to be retricom. In the midst of this mamomer the department store's great van faithfully disgorged their hed and bedkling. Hardly watimg to see these deposited, the two hurried ont in quest of samdwiches and milk.
"I gness we're the lightning home makers, all right," was Miss Mison's comment as they lumehed.

Returning to the department store they bought and bronght away with them a kettle, a china teapot ("Fifteen cents in the basement," Miss Mason instructed), three eups and satucers, six plates, a tin of floor-polish and a few knives, forks, and spoons. Mernwhite they had telephoned the hotel to send orer the bagrage. When the street ear dropped them near the studio they foum the two Italians seated on the steps, the furniture and baggage in the room. and Mrs. Corriani wiping her last window pane. "I shall want your hushand agrain for this floor," commanded the indefatigable Miss Mason, opening her tin of polish, "and his friend for errands." They fell upon their task.

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)

An hour later the spinster dropped into the roeking chair. "Well, we've done it," slie said, "and I don't mind telling you I'm tuekered out."

Mary's voiee answered from the sink, where she was sluieing her face and arms.
"You've been a marvel-the whole thing has been Napoleonie-and I simply don't know how to thank you." She appeared at the door of the eloset, which was to serve as kitchenette and bathroom, drying her hands.
"My, your face is like a rose! You don't look tired any!" exclaimed the spinster. "As for thanks, why, it's been a treat to me. I've felt like I was a girl again. But we're through now, and I've got to go." She rose. "I guess I'll enjoy my sleep to-night."
"Oh, don't go, Miss Mason, stay for tea and let my husband thank you too."

But the little New Englander again showed her simple taet. 'No, no, my dear, it's time I went, and you and Mr. Byrd will want to be alone together your first evening,' and she pulled on her cotton gloves.

At the door Mary impulsively put her arms round Miss Mason and kissed her.
"You have been good to me-I shall never forget it," she whispered, almost loath to let this first woman friend of her new life go.

Alone, Mary turned to survey the room.
The floor, of wide uneven planks, was bare, but it earried a dark stain, and this had been waxed until it shone. The walls, painted gray, had yielded a elean surface to the mop. The grate was blaekened. On either side of it stood the two large chairs, and Mary had thrown a strip of bright stuff over the eushions of the Morris. Beside this chair stood the smaller table, polished, and upon it blue and white tea things. Near the large window stood the other table, with Stefan's palette, paint tubes, and brushes in orderly array, and a ptain chair beside it, while centered at that end was the model-throne. Opposite the fireplace the divan fronted the wall, obscured by Mary's steamer rug and green deek cushion. At the end of the room the heavy ehest of drawers, with its dark walnut paint, faeed the window, bearing the gilded mirror and a strip of embroidery. On the mantlepieee stood Mary's traveling elock and the two brass eandlestieks, and above it Stefan's pastoral of the stream and the dancing faun was taeked upon the wall. She eould hear the kettle singing from the eloset, through the open deor of whieh a shaft of sunlight fell from the tiny window to the floor.

Suddenly Mary opened her arms. "Home," she whispered, "home." Tcars started to her eyes. With a earessing movement she leant her faee against the wall, as to the eheek of her lover.

But emotion lay deep in Mary-she was ashamed that it should rise to facile tears. "Silly girl," she thought, and drying her eyes proceeded more ealmly to her final task, whieh was to ehange her dress for one fitted to honor Stefan's homeeoming.

Hardly was she ready when she heard his feet upon the stair. Her heart leapt with a double joy, for he was springing up two steps at a time, triumph in every bound. The door burst open; she was enveloped in a whirlwind embrace. "Mary,"' he gasped between kisses, "I've sold the boy-sr'd him for a hundred! At the very last place-just as I'd given up. You beloved oraele!"

76 THE NEST-BUILDER

Then he held her away from him, devouring with his eyes her glowing face, her hair, and her soft blue dress. "Oh, you beauty! The day has been a thousand years long without you!" He eauglit her to him again.

Mary's heart was almost bursting with happiness as she clung to him. IIere, in the home she had prepared, he had brouglit her his suceess, and their love glorified both. Her emotion left her wordiess. Another moment, and his eyes swept the room.
"Why, Mary!" It was a shout of joy. "You magician, you miraele-worker! It's beautiful! Don't tell me low you did it-" hastily-_"I couldn't understand. It's enough that you waved your hand and beaty sprang up! Look at my little faun dancing-we must dance too!'" IIe lilted a swaying air, and whirled her round the room with gipsy glee. His face looked like the faun's, elfin, misehievous, liappy as the springtime.

At last he dropped into a chair. Then Mary fetehed her teakettle. They quenched their thirst, slie shared his cigarette, they prattled like ehildren. It was la before they remembered to go out in seareh of dinnes, hours later before they dropped asleep upon the gilded Janus-faced couch that had beeome for Mary the altar of a sacrament.

IV

MARY'S original furnishings had cost her less than a hundred dollars. In the first days of their housekeping she made several additions, and Stefan contributed a large second-hanc easel, a stool, and a picce of strangely colored drapery for the divan. This he discovered during a walk with Mary, in the window of an old furniture dealer, and instantly fell a vietim to. He was so delighted with it that Mary had not the heart to veto its purchase, though it was a sad extravagance, costing them more than a week's living expenses. The stuff was of oriental silk, shot with a changing sheen of colors like a fire burning over water, which made it seem a living thing in their hands. The night they took it home Stefan lit six candles in its honor.

In spite of these expenses Mary banked four hundred dollars, leaving herself enough in hand for a fortnight to come, for she found that they could live on twenty-five dollars a week. She calculated that they must make, as an absolute mininum, to be safe, one hundred dollars a month, for she was determined, if possible, not to draw further upon their hoard. This was destined for a future use, the hope of which trembled constantly in her heart. All her plans centered about this hope, but she still forebore to speak of it to Stefan, even as she had donc before their marriage. Perhaps she instinctively feared a possible lack of response in him. Meanwhile, she must safeguard her nest.

78 THE NEST-BUILDER

In spite of Stefan's initial sheress, Mary wondered if his art would at first yield the necessary monthly income, and east about for some means by which she could inerease his earnings. She had come to Ameriea to attain independenee, and there was nothing in her code to make dependenee a necessary element of marriage.
"Stefan," she said one morning, as she sat eovering a enshion, while he worked at one of the unfinished pastorals, "you know I seld several short stories for children when I was in London. I think I ought to try my luck here, don't you?"
"You don't need to, sweetheart," he replied. "Wait till I've finished this little thing. You see if the man I sold the boy to won't jump at it for another hundred." And he whistled cheerily.
"I'm sure he will," she smiled. "Still, I slrould like to help."
"Do it if you want to, Beautiful, only I ean't assoeiate you with pens and typewriters. I'm sure if you were just to open your morth, and sing, out thore in the square- ' he waved a brush-_"people would eome running from all over the city and throw yellow and green bills at you like leaves, ’!ll you had to be dug out with long shovils by those funny street-eleaners who go about looking dirty in white clothes. Your would be a nymph in a shower of gold-only the gold would be paper. How like Ameriea!" He whistled again absently, touehing the eanvas with delicate strokes.
"You are quite the most ridieulous person in the world," she laughed at him. "Yon know perfeetly well that my voiec is mueh too small to be of practical value."
"But I'm not being practical, and you mustn't be literal, darling-goddesses never should."
"Be practical just for a moment then," she urged, "and think about my chances of selling stories."
"I couldn't," he said absently, holding his brush suspended. "Wait a minute, I've got an idea! That about the shower of gold-I know-Danaë!" he she ated suddenly, throwing down his palette. "That's how I'll paint you. I've been puzzling over it for days. Darling, it will be my ehef d'œuvre!" He seized her hands. "Think of it! You standing under a great shaft of sun, nude, exalted, your hands and eyes lifted. About you gold, pouring down in eataracts, indistinguishable from the sunlight-a background of prismatic fire-and your hair lifting into it like wings!" He was irradiated.

She had blushed to the eves. "You want me to sit to you-like that?" Her voice trembled.

He gazed at her in frank amazement. "Should you mind?" he asked, amazed. "Why, you rose, you're blushing. I believe you're shy!"' He put his arms around her, smiling into her face. "You wouldn't mind, darling, for me?" he urged, his cheek to hers. "Yois are so glorious. I've always wanted to paint your glory since the first day I saw you. You can't mind?"

He saw she still hesitated, and his tone became not only surprised but hurt. He could not conceive of shame in connection with beauty. Secing this she mastered her shrinking. He was right, she felt-she had given him her beauty, and a denial of it in the service of his art would rebuft the God in him--the creator. She yielded, but she could not express the deeper reason for her emotion. As he was so oblivious, she could not bring herself to tell him why in particular she shrank from sitting as Danaë. IIe liad not thought of the meaning of the myth in connection with her all-absorbing hope.

80

 THE NEST-BUILDER"Promise me one thing," she pleaded. "Don't make the face too like me-just a little different, dearest, please!"

This a trifle fretted him.
"I don't really see why; your face is just the right trpe," he puzzled. "I shan't sell the picture, you know. It will be for us-our marriage present to each other."
"Nevertheless, I ask it, dearest." With that he had to be content.

Stefan obtained that afternoon a full-length eanvas, and the sittings began next morning. He was at his most inspiring, laughed away Mary's stage fright, posed her with a delight which inspired her, too, so that she stood readily as he suggested, and made half a dozen lightning sketches to determine the most perfeet position, exclaining enthusiastically mearwhile.

When absorbed, Stefin was a sure and rapid worker. ifary posed for him every morning, and at the end of a week the picture had advanced to a thing of wonderful promise and beauty. Mary would stand before it almost awed. Was this she, she poudered, this aspiring woman of flame? It troubled her a little that his ideal of her should rise to such splendor; this apotheosis left no place for the pitying tenderness of love, only for its glory. The color of this pieture was like the sound of silver trumpets; the heart-throb of the stringe was missing. IIary was neither morbid nor 'ntrospective, but at this time her whole being was keyed to more than normal comprehension. Watching the picture, seeng that it was a portrayal i.Jt of her but of his love for her, she woudered if any woman could long endure the arduonsness of such deification. or if a man who had visioned a goddess could long content himself with a mortal.

The face, too, vag ely troubled her. True to his promise, Stefan had not made it a portrait, but its malikeness lay rather in the meaning and expression than in the features. These differed only in detail from her own. A slight lengthening of the comers of the eyes, a fullor and wider month were the only changes. But the expression amidst its exaltation held a quality she did not nuder. stand. Translated into music, it was the call of the wood-wind, something wild and unhmman flowing across the silver triumph of the horns.
Of these half questionings, however, Mary said nothing, telling Stefan only what was sure of, that the picture would be a masterpiece.

The days were shortening. Stefan found the light poor in the afternoons, and had to take part of the mornings for work on lis pastoral. This he would have ne ${ }^{-}$ leeted in his enthusiasm for the Danaë, but for Mar' 's urgings. He obeyed her mandates on practical iss witls the unquestioning aeceptance of a child. His a...tude suggested that he was willing to be worldly from time to time if his Mary-not too often-told him to.
The weather had turned cool, and Mr. Corriani brought them up their first senttle of eoal. They were glad to drink their morning eoffee and eat their lunch before the fire, and Mary's little sable neck-picee, relie of former opulence, appeared in the evenings when they sought their dinner. This they tocs in restaurants near by-quaint basiments, or back parlors of once fine houses, where they were served nutritious ineals on hare boards, in china half an inch thick. Antumn, New York's most beautiful season, was in the air with its heart-lightening tang; energy seemed to flow into them as they breathed. They took long walks in the aitei'- noons to the Park, which Stefan voted lopelessly banal; to the Metropolitan Musenm, where they paid homage to the Sorohlas and the Rodins; to the Battery, the doeks, and the whole downtown district. This fhey found oppressive at first, till they saw it after dark from a ferry boat, when Stefan became fired by the towerlike skyserapers sketched in patterns of light against the void.

Immediately he developed a cult for these buildings. "Annerica's one eacation," he called them, "monstrous, rooted repellently in the earth's bowels, growing rank like weeds, but art for all that." He made several sketehes of them, in which the buildings seemed to sway in a drunkeu abandomment of powr. "Wieked things," he named them, and saw them menacing but faseinating, titanie engines that would overwhelm their makers. He and Mary lad quite an argment about this, for she thought the skyscrapers beantiful.
"The! reach sunward, Stefan, they do not menaee, they aspire," she objeeted.
"The aspiration is yours, Goddess. They are only fit symbols of a super-materialism. Their strength is evil, but it lures."

He was delighted with his drawings. Mary, who was beginning to develop eivie pride, told him they were goblinesque.
"Clever girl, that's why I like them," he replied.
iate in October Stefan sold his pastoral, though only for seventy-five dollars. This disappointed him greatly. He was anxions to repay his debt to Adolph, but would not accept the loan of it from his wife. Mary renewed her determination to be helpful, and sent one of her old stories to a magazine, but without suecess. She had no one to advise her as to likely markets, and posited her dan iscript to two more unsuitable pmblications, receiv. ing it back with a printed rejection slip.

IIer forsth attempt, linwever, was rewarded iy a note from the editor which grave her much encomagement. Chidren's stories, he explained, were ontiside the seope of his magezine, but he thought highly of hrs. Byrd's manuseript, and advised her to submit it to one of the women's papers-he named several-who.e it might be aceeptable. Mary was delighted by this note, and read it to Strfin.
"Splendid!" he eried, "I had no idea you had bronght any stories over with you. Guarded oracle!" he added, teasingly:
"Oracles don't tell seerets unlass they are asised," she rejoined.
"True. And now I do ask. Give me the whole secerct -read me the story," he exclaimed, promptly putting away his brushes, lighting a cigarette, and throwing lianself, eagerly attentive, into the Morris chair.

Mary prepared to comply, gladly if a little nervously. She had been somewhat hurt at his eomplete lack of interest in her writing; now she vas anxions for his approbation. Seated in the rocking chair she read alond the little story in lior clear low voice. When she had finished she found Stefan regarding her with an expression affeetionate but somewhat quizzieal.
"Mlary, you have almost a maternal air, sitting there read: ig so lovingly about a baby. It's a new aspectthe rocker helos. I've never quite liked that chair-it reminds me of Michigan."

Mary had flushed painfully, but he did not notiee it in the hulf light of the fire. It had grown dark as she read.

84 TIIE NES'R-13ULLDER

"But the story, Stefun?" she asked, her tone obvionsly hurt. He jumped up and kissed her, all contrition.
"Darling, it sounded benutiful in your voiere, and I'm sure it is. In fact I know it is. But I simply don't understimd that type of fiction; I have no key to it. So my mind wandered a little. I listemerl to the lovely sounds your voice mude, and watched the firelight on your hair. Yon were like a Duteh interior-quite a new aspect, as I said-and I got interested in that."

Mary was abashed and disappointed. For the first time she questioned stefan's generosity, eontrasting his indifference with her own absorbed interest in his work. She knew her muse trivial by eomparison with his, but she loved it, and ached for the stimulus his praise would bring.

Beneath the wound to her craftsmanship lay another, in which the knife was turning, but she wuald not face its implication. Nevertheless it oppressed her throughout the evening, $s$ that Stefan eommented on her silence. That nieht as she lay awake listening to his easy breathing, for the first time since her marriage her pillow was dampenecu by tears.

V

IN the next morning's sun Mary's f ra titions ap. peared absurd. Stefin waked in hi. . spirits, and plamed a morning's work on his drawings of the ity, while Mary, off duty as a morlel, decided to take her story in person to the othice of one of the women's papers. As she "rossed the square and walked up lower Fifth A velme she had never felt more buoyant. The smim was brilliant, anti a cool breeze whipped eolor into her chereks.

The office to which she was bonnd was on the north side of Cinion Square. Crossing Broadway, she was hed up half way over by the traffic. As she waited for an opening her attention was attraeted by the singular anties of a large mam, who med to be performing some kind of a ponderons fling upon the enristone opposite. A moment more and she grasped that the dance was a signal to her, and that the mam was nome other than NeEwam, spracely tailored and trimmed in the Ameriean fashion, but ummistakable for all that. She crossed the street and shook hands with him warmly, delighted to see any one comnected with the romantic days of her voy age. Me Ewan's smile scemed to buttress his whole face with teeth, but to her amazement he greeted her without a trace of Scotel accent.
"Well," said he, pumping both her hands up and down in his enormous fist, "here's Mrs. Byrd! That's simply great. I've been wondering where I could locate you both. Ought to have nosed you out before now, but my job keeps me busy. I'm with a magazine house, you know-advertising manager."

86

"I didn't know," answered Mary, whose head was whirling.
"Ah," he grinned at her, "you're surprised at my metanorphosis. I allow myself a month every year of my native heath heather-mixture, and burr-I like to do the thing up brown. The rest of the time I'm a Gothamite, of neeessity. Some time, when I've made my pile, I shall revert for keeps, and settle down into a kilt and a castle."

Mueh amused by this unsuspected histrionic gift, Mary walked on beside McEwan. He was full of interest in her affairs, and she soon confided to him the object of her expedition.
"You're just the man to advise me, being on a paper," she said, and added laughing, "I should have been terrified of you if I'd known that on the ship."
"Then I'm glad I kept it dark. You say your stuff is for ehildren? Where were you going to?"

She told him.
"A woman's the boss of that shop. She's O. K. and so's her paper, but her prices aren't high." He considered. "Better come to our shop. We run tiro monthlies and a weekly, one critical, one houschold, one entirely for children. The boss is a great pal of mine. Name of Farraday-an Ameriean. Come on!" And he whecled her abruptly back the way they had come. She followed unresistingly, intensely amused at his quiek, jerky sentences and crisp manner-the very antithesis of his former Scottish heaviness.
"Mr. MeEwan, what an actor you would have mide!"

She smiled up at him as she hurried at his side. IIe looked about with pretended eaution, then stooped to her ear.
"IIoots, lassie!" he whispered, with a solemn wink.
"Stefan will never believe this!" she said, bubbling with laughter.

At the door of a building elose to the eomer where they had met lie stopped, and for a moment his manner, though not his voice, assumed its erstwhile weightiness.
"Never mind!' he held up an admonishing forefinger. "I do the talking. What do you know about business? Nothing!" His hand swept away possible objections. "I know your work." She gasped, but the finger was up again, solemnly wagging. "And I say it's good. How many words?" he half snapped.
"Three thousand five hindred," she answerer.
"Then I say, two hinndred dollars-not a eent lessand what I say gocs, see?" The finger shot out at her, menaeing.
"I leave it to you, Mr. MeEwan," she answered meekly, and followed him to the lift, dazed. "This," she said to herself, "simply is not happening!" She felt like Aliee in Wonderland.

They shot up many stories, and emerged into a large office furnished with a switch-board, benehes, tables, desks, pieirres, and offiee boys. 1 ecaseless stenographie elick resounded from behind an eight-foot partition; the telephone girl seemed to be engaged eonjointly on a novel and a dozen phigs; the offiee boys were diligent with their ehewing gum; all was activity. Mary felt at a loss, but the great McEwan, towering over the switchboard like a Juggernaut, instantly eompelled the operator's eyes from their multiple distractions. "Good morning, Mr. MeEwan-Spring one-O-two-four," she greeted him.
" 'Morning. T' see Mr. Farraday,'" he economized.
"M'st Farraday-M'st MeEwan an' lady t' see you. Yes. M'st Farraday'll see you right away. 'Sthis three-one hundred? Hold th' line, please," said the operator in one breath, eomecting two ealls and waving McEwan forward simultaneonsly. Mary followed him down a long eorridor of doors to one whieh he opened, throwing back a seeond door within it.

They entered a sumny room, quiet, and with an air of spacious order. Faeing them was a large mahogany table, ahmost bare, save for a vase whielı held yellow roses. Flowers grew in a window box and another vase of white roses stood on a book shelf. Mary's eyes flew to the flowers even before she observed the man who rose to greet them from beyond the table. Ine was very tall, with the lean New Eugland build. His long, bony faee was unlandsome save for the eyes and mouth, whieh held an expression of great sweetness. He shook hands with a kindly smile, and Mary took an instant liking to him, feeling in his presence the ease that eomes of classfellowship. He looked, she thought, something under forty years old.
"I an fortunate. You find me in a breathing spell," he was saying.
"IIe's the busiest man in New York, but he always has time," MeEwan explained, and, indeed, nothing eould have been more unhurried than the whole atmosphere of both man and room. Mary said so.
"Yes, I must have quiet or I ean't work," Farraday replied. "My windows face the baek, you see, and my walls are double; I doubt if there's a quieter office in New York."
"Nor a more charming, I should think," added Mary, looking about at the restful tones of the room, with its landseapes, its beautifully chosen old furniture, and its flowers.
"The owner thanks you," he aeknowledged, with his kindly smile.
"Business, business," interjected MeEwan, who, Mary was amused to observe, approximated much more to the popular idea of an American than did his friend. "I've brought you a find, Farraday. This lady writes for ehildren-she's printe? stuff in England. I haven't read it, but I know it's good beeause I've seen her telling stories to the kids by the hour aboard ship, and you couldn't budge them. You can see," he waved his hand at her, "that her copy would be out of the ordinary run."

This absurdity would have embarrassed Mary but that Mr. Farraday turned on her a smile whieh seemed to make them allies in their joint comprehension of MeEwan's advocaey.
"She's got a story with her for you to sec," went on that enthusiast. "I've told her if it's good enough for our magazine it's two hundred dollars good enough. 'There's the seript." IIe took it from her, and flattened it out on Farraday's table. "Look it over and write her. What's your address?" he shot at Mary. She produced it.
"I'll remember that," MeEwan nodded; "eoming round to see you. There you are, James. We won't kecp you. You have no time and I have less. Come on, Mrs. Byrd." He made for the door, but Farraday lifted his hand.
"Too fast, Mac," he smiled. "I haven't had a chance yet. A nere American can't kcep pace with the dynamic energy you store in Scotland. Where does it come from? Do you do nothing but sleep there?"
"Much more than that. He practises the art of being a Scotchman," laughed Mary.
"He has no need to praetise. You should have heard him when he first came over," said Farraday.
"Well, if you two are going to discuss me, I'll leave you at it; I'm not a highbrow cditor; I'm the poor ad man-my time means money to me." McEwan opened the door, and Mary rose to accompany him.
"Won't you sit down again, Mrs. Byrd? I'd like to ask you a fcw questions," interposed Farraday, who had been turning the pages of Mary's manuseript. "Mac, you be off. I can't focus my mind in the presence of a human gyroscope."
"I've got to beat it," agreed the other, shaking hands warmly with Mary. "But don't you be taken in by him; he likes to pretend he's slow, but he's really as quick as a buzz-saw. Sce you soon,' and with a final wave of the hand he was gone.
"Now tell me a little about your work," said Farraday, turning on Mary his kind but penetrating glance. She told him she had published three or four stories, and in what magazines.
"I only began to write fiction a year ago," she explained. "Before that I'd done nothing except scribble a little verse at home."
"What kind of verse?"
"Oh, just silly little children's rhymes."
"Have you sold any of them?"
"No, I never tried."
"I should like to see them," he sain, to her surprise. "I could use them perhaps if they were good. As for this story," he turned the pages, "I see you have an original idea. A elild bird-tamer, dumb, whose power no one can explain. Before they talk babies can understand the birds, but as soon as they learn to speak they forget bird language. This child is dumb, so he remembers, but can't tell any one. Very pretty."

Mary gasped at his accurate summary of her idea. He seemed to have photographed the pages in his mind at a glance.
"I had tried to make it a little mysterious," she said rather ruefully. Ilis smile reassured her.
"You have," he nodded, "but we editors learn to get impressions quiekly. Yes," he was reading as he spoke, "I think it likely I can use this. The style is good, and individual." He touched a bell, and handed the manuscript to an answering office boy. "Ask Miss Haviland to read this, and report to me to-day," he ordered.
"I rarely have time to read manuscripts myself," he went on, "but Miss Havilan? is my assistant for our eliildren's magazine. If her judgment firms mine, as I feel sure it will, we will mail you a : ue to-night, Mrs. Byrd-aceording to our friend McEwan's instrue-tions-" and he smiled.

Mary blushed with pleasure, and again rose to go, with an attempt at thanks. The telephone bell had twice, with a mere thread of sound, announced a summons. The editor took up the reeciver. "Yes, in five minutes," he answered, hanging up and turning again to Mary.

92

THE NEST-BUILDER

"Don't go yet, Mrs. Byrd; allow me the luxury of postponing other business for a moment. We do not meet a new contributor and a new citizen every day." IIe leant baek with an air of complete leisure, turning to her his kindly, open smile. She felt wonderfully at her case, as though this man and she were old aequaintanees. IIe asked more about her work and that of her husband.
"We like to have some personal knowledge of our authors; it liclps us in eritieism and suggestion," he explained.

Mary described Stefan's sueeess in Paris, and mentioned his sketches of downtown New York. Farraday looked interested.
"I should like to see those," he said. "We have an illustrated review in which we sometimes rise such things. If you are bringing me your verses, your husband might care to come too, and slow me the drawings."

Again the insistent telephone purred, and this time he let Mary go, shaking her hand and holding the door for her.
"Bring the verses whenever you like, Mrs. Byrd," was his farewell.

When she had gone, James Farraday returncd to his desk, lit a ci_.tr, and smoked absently for a moments, staring out of the window. Then he pulled his ehair forward, and unhooked the reeciver.

VI

MARY hurried home vibrant with happiness, and ran into the studio to find Stefan diseonsolately gazing out of the window. He whirled at her approach, and eaught her in his arms.
"Wicked one! I thought. like Persephone, you had been earried off by Dis and his wagon," he chidnd. "I eould not work when I realized you had been gone so long. Where have you been?" He looked quite woebegone.
"Ah, I'm so glad you missed me," she eried from his arms. Then, unable to contain her delight, she danced to the center of the room, and, throwing back her head, burst into soug. 'Praise God from whom all blessings flow," chanted Mary full-throated, her ehest expanded, pouring out her gratitude as whole-heartedly as a lark.
"Mary, I can see your wings," interrupted Stefan excitedly. "You're soaring!" He rcized a stick of charcoal and dashed for paper, only $t$. hrow down his tools again in mock despair. "Pouf, you're beyond sketching at this moment-you need a eathedral organ to express you. What has happencd? Have you been sojourning with the immortals?"
But Mary had stopped singing, and dropped on the divan as if suddenly tired. She held out her arms to Stefan, and he sat beside her, lover-like.
"Oh, dearest," she said, her voice vibrating with tenderness, "I've wanted so to help, nuld nw I think I've sold a story, and I've fotind a chance for your New York drawings. I'm so happy.'

94 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Why, you mysterious creature, your eyes have tears in them-and all because you've helped me! I've never sten your tears, Mary; they make your eyes like stars lost i a pool." IIe kissed lier passionatcly, and she responded, but waited eagerly to hear him praise her suecess. After a moment, however, he got up and wandered to his drawing board.
"You say you found a chanee for these," indicating the sketehes. "How splendi. of you! Tell me all about it." IIe was eagerly attentive, but she might never have meuitioned her story. Apparently, that part of her report simply had not registered in his brain.

Mary's spirits suddenly dropped. She had eome from an interview in which she was treated as a serious artist, and her husband could not even hear the aceount of her suceess. She rose and beyan to prepare their luneheon, recounting lier adventures meanwhile in a rather flat voice. Stefan listened to her description of McEwan's metamorphosis only half eredulously.
"Don't tell me," he commented, "that the eloven hoof will not out. Do you mean to say it's to him that you owe this chance?"

She nodded.
"I don't see how we can take favors from that brute," he sdid, running his hands moodily into his pockets.

Mary looked at him in frank astonishment.
"I don't understand you, Stefan," she said. "Mr. MeEwan was kindness itself, and I am grateful to him, but there can be no question of receiving favors on your part. He introduced me to Mr. Farraday as a writer, and it was only through me that your work was mentioned at all." She was hurt by his narrow intolerance, and he saw it.
"Very well, goddess, don't flash your lightnings at me." He laughed gaily, ind sat down to his luncheon. Throughout it Mary listened to a detailed account of his morning's work.
Next day sle reecived by the first post a eheque for two hundred dollars, with a formal typewritten note from Farraday, expressing pleasure, and a hope that the Household Publishing Company might reeive other manuseripts from her for its eonsideration. Stefan was setting his pallette for a morning's work or the Danaë. She ealled to lim rather constrainedly from the door where she had opened the letter.
"Stefan, I've received a eheque for two hundrea dollars for my story."
"That's splendid," he answered eheerfully. "If I sell these sketehes we shall be quite rieh. We must move from this absurd place to a proper studio flat. Mary shall have a white bathroom, and a beautiful blue and gold bed. Also minions to set food before her. Tra-la-la," and he hummed gaily. "I'm ready to begin, beloved,' he added.

As Mary prepared for her sitting she could not subdue a slight feeling of irritation. Apparently she might never, even for a moment, enjoy the luxury of being a human being with ambitions like Stefan's own, but must remain ever pedestaled as his inspiration. She was irked, too, by his hopelessly unpractieal attitude toward affairs. She would have enjoyed the friendly status of a partner as a wholesome complement to the ardors of marriage. She knew that her husband differed from the

96

 THE NEST'-BUILDERlegendary bohemian in having a strietly upright cole in money matters, but she wished it could be less visionary. Ife mentally oseillated between pauperism and riehes. Let him fail to sell a pietmre and he offered to pawn his coat; but the picture sold, he aspired to hire a mansion. In a word, she began to see that he was incapable either of foresight or moderation. Could she alone, she wondered, supply the deficieney?

That evening when they returned from dinner, which as a taine treat they had caten in the cafi of their old hotel, they fomd MeEwan waiting their arrival from a seat on the stairs.
"Here you are," his hearty voice called to them as they labored up the last flight. "I was determined noot to miss you. I wanted to pay my respects to the couple, and see how the paint-slinging was getting on."

Mary, knowing now that the Seotehman was not the slow-witted blunderer he had appeared on board ship, looked at him with sudden suspicion. Was she deceived, or did there lurk a teasing gleam in those blue cyes? Had MeEwi.. used the outraseous phrase "paint-slinging" with malice aforethonght? She eonld not be sure. But if his object was to get a rise from Stefan, he was only partly successful. Truc, her lunshand snorted with disgust, but, at a tonels from her and a whispered "Be nice to him," restrained himself sufficiently to invite MeEwan in with a frigid show of politeness. Hut once inside, and the candles lighted, Stefan leant ghomly against the mantrlpiece with his hands in his pockets, evidently determined to leave their visitor entirely on Mary's lands.

MeEwan was nothing loath. IIe helped himself to a cigarette, and proceeded to survey the walls of the ruom with interest.
"Nifty work, Mrs. Byrd. You mmst be prond of him, " and again Mary semed to catcha ghint in his cere. " ese sketeles now," he "pproached the table on which lay the skyseraper studies. "Very hamb-eruel, yon might say-hut clever, yes, sir, mighty clever." Mary saw Stefan writhe with irritation at the other's air of eommosscur. She shot him a cramee at one: ammsed and pleadiug, but he ignomen it with at sheng as if to indic:ates that Mary was responsible for this intrusions, and mast expect no aid from him.

Diekwan now faced the easel which held the great Danaë, shromed by a cloth.
"Is this the latest masiterpiece-ran it be seen?" he esked, turning to his host, his hand hall stretched to the cover.

Mary made an exclamation of denial, and started forward to intereent the hand. But even as she moved, dismay visible on her face, the pereerse devil which had been mounting in Stefan's brain attained the mastery. She had asked him to be nice to this jackass-vary well. he would.
"Yes, that's the best hing I've done, Mre'wan. As you're a friend of both of us, you ought to see it," he exclaimed, and before Mary conld utter a protest had wheeled the casel romed to the light and thrown back the drapery. He massed the randles on the mantelpiece. "IIere," he called, "stand here where yon can see properly. Mythologieal, you see, Danaë. What do you think of it?" There were mischief and triumph in his tone, and a shadow of spite.

98

 THE NEST-BUILDERMary had bluslied crimson and stond, incapable of speech, in the darkest corner of the room. MeEwnn had not noticed her protest, it hat! all happened so instantaneously. IIe followed Stefan's direction, and faced the eanvus expectantly. There was a long silence. Mary, watching, saw the spruce vencer of metropolitun. ism fu!l from their guest like a discarded mons-the grave, steady Highlander emerged. Stefan's monent of malice hand thashed and died-he stood biting his nails, already too ashamed to glance in Mary's direetion. At last MeEwan turned. There was homage in his eyes, and gruvity.
"Mr. Byrd," he said, and his deep voiee earried somewhat of its old Seottish burr, "I owe ye an apology. I took ye for a tricky young mon, clever but better pleased with yersel' than ye had a 'glt to be. I see ye are a grent artist, and as such, ye hae the right even to the love of that lady. Now I will congratulate her." He strode over to Mary's corner and took her hand. "Dear leddy,'" he said, his native speech still more apparent, "I confess I didna think the young mon worthy, and in me blunderin' way, I would hae kept the two o' ye apart could I hac done it. But I was wrong. Ye've married n genius, and ye can be proud o' the way ye'ro helping hmu. Now I'll bid ye good night, and I hope ye'll baith comit me yer friend in all things.' Ile offered his hand to Stefan, who took it, touched. Gravely he pieked up his hat, and opened the door, turning for a half bow before closing it behind him.

Stcfan knew that he had behaved unpardonably, that he had been betrayed into a piece of caddishness, but MeEwan had given him the cue for his defensc. He hastened to Mary and seized her hand.
"Darling, forgive me. I knew you didn't what the picture shown, but it's got to be dome some duy, hasn't it? It seemed a shme for Mclewn not to see what yon have inspired. I ought not to have shown it withont asking you, but his appreciation justified me, don't yon think?" II is tone coaxed.

An"y was choking buck e tears. Explanations, exeuses, were to her trivial, nor was she eupable of therm. Wounded, she wis always damb, and to disenss a hurt seemed to her to aggravate it.
"Don't let's talk about it, Stefun," she murmmed. "It seemed to me you showed the picture because I did not wish it-that's what I don't understand." She spoke lifelessly.
"No, no, yon mustn't think that," he urgerl. "I was irritated, and i'm horribly sorry, but I do think it should be shown."

But Mary was not deecived. If only for a moment, he had been disloyal to her. The muge of her love made it easy to forgive him, bit she knew she could not so readily forget.
Though she put a owod face on the incident, thongh Stefan was his most charming self throughout the evening, even though she refused to reeognize the loss, one veil of illusion had been stripped from her heart's image of him.

In his eontrite mood, determined to please her, Stefan recalled the matter of her stories, and for the first time spoke of her snecess with enthusiasm. He asked her about the editor, and offered to go with her the next morning to show Mr. Farraday his sketehes.
"Have you anything else to take him?" he asked.
"Yes," replied Mary. "I am to show him some verses

I wrote at home in Lindum. Just little songs for children."
"Verses," he exclaimed; "how wonderful! I knew you were a goddess and a song-bird, but not that you were a poet, too."
"Nor am I; they are the most trifling things."
"I expect they are delicious, like your singing. Read them to me, beloved,' he begged.

But Mary would not. He pressed her several times during the evening, but for the first time since their marriage he found he could not move her to compliance.
"Please don't bother about them, Stefan. They are for children; they would not interest you."

He felt himself not wholly forgiven.

VII

ADAY or two later the Byrds went together to the office of the Household P'ublishing Company and sent in their names to Mr. Farraday. This time they had to wait their turn for admittance for over half an hour, sharing the benches of the outer office with several men and women of types rangiug from the extreme of æstheticism to the obviously commercial. The office was hung with original drawings of the covers of the firm's three publications-The Household Review, The Household Magazinc, and The Child at IIome. Stefan prowled around the room mentally demolishing the drawings, while Mary glanced through the copies of the magazines that covered the large central table. she was impressed by the high level of makeup and illustration in all three periodicals, contrasting them with the obvious and often inanc contents of similar English publications. At a glance the sheets appeared wholesome, but not narrow; dignified, but not dull. She wondered how much of their general tone they owed to Mr. Farraday, and determined to ask MeEwan more about his friend when next she saw him. Her speculations were interrupted by Stefan, who somewhat exeitedly pulled her sleeve, juinting to a colored drawing of a woman's head on the wall bchind her.
"Look, Mary!" he ejaculated. "Rotten bourgeois art, but an interesting face, eln? I wonder if it's a good portrait. It says in the corner, 'Study of Miss Felicity Berber.' An actress, I expeet. Look at the eyes; subtle, aren't they? And the heavy little mouth. I've never seen a face quite like it." He was visibly intrigued.

102 THE NEST-BUILDER

Mary thought the face provocative, but somewhat unpleasant.
"It's certainly interesting-the predatory type, I should think," she replied.
"l'll bet it's true to life-the artist is too much of a fool to have ereated that expression," Stefan went on. "Jove, I should like to meet her, shouldn't you?" he asked naïvely.
"Not particularly," said Mary, smiling at him. "She'll have to be your friend; :'s too feline for me."
"The very word, observant ou,," he agreed.
At this point their summons came. Nary was very anxious that her husband should make a good inpression. "I hope you'll like him, dearest," she whispered as for the second time the editor's door opened to her.

Farraday shook hands with them pleasantly, but turned his level glanee rather fixedly on her husband, Mary thought, before breaking into his kindly smile. Stefan retumed the smile with interest, plainly delighted at the evidences of taste that surrounded him.
"I'm sorry you should have had to wait so long," said Farraday. "I'm rarely so fortunately unoceupied as on your first visit, Mrs. Byrd. You've brought the verses to show me? Good! And Mr. Byrd has his drawings?" He turned to Stefan. "Ameriea nwes you a debt for the new eitizen you have given her, Mr. Byrd. May I offer my congratulations?"
"Thanks," beamed Stefan, "but you couldn't, adequately, you know."
"Obviously not," assented the other with a glance at Mary. "Our mutual friend, McEwan, was here again yesterday, with a most glowing aecount of your work, Mr. Byrd; he seems to have adopted the rôle of press agent for the family."
"He's the soul of kindness," said Mary.
"Yes, a thoroughly good sort," Stefan coneeded. "Here are the New York sketelies," he went on, opening his portfolio on Farraday's desk. "Half a dozen of them."
"Thank you, just a moment," interposed the editor, who had opened Mary's manuscript. "Your wife's work takes precedence. She is an established contributor, you see," he smiled, running his eyes over the pages.
Stefan sat down. "Of course," he said, rather absently.

Farraday gave an exclamation of pleasure.
"Mrs. Byrd, these are good; musually so. They have the Stevenson flavor without being imitations. A little condensation, perhaps-I'll pencil a few suggestionsbut I must have them all. I would not let anotlier magazine get them for the world! Let me see, how many are there? Eight. We might bring them out in a series, il ustrated. What if I were to offer the illustrating to Mr. Byrd, eh?" He put down the sheets and glaneed from wife to husband, evidently charmed with his idea. "What do you tlink, Mr. Byrd? Is your style suited to her work?" he asked.

Stefan looked thoroughly taken abaek. IIe laughed shortly. "I'm a painter, Mr. Farraday, not an illustrator. I haven't time to undertake that kind of thing. Even these drawings," he indicated the portfolio, "were done in spare moments as an amusement. My wife suggested placing them with you-I shouldn't have thought of it."

104 THE NEST-BUILDER

To Mary his tone sounded needlessly ungracious, but the editor appeared not to notice it.
"I beg your pardon," he replied suavely. "Of course, if you don't illustrate-I'm sorry. The collaboration of husband and wife would have been an attraction, even though the names were unknown here. l'll get Lecdward to do them."

Stefin sat up. 'You don't mean Metealf Ledward, the painter, do you?"' he exclaimed.
"Yes," replied Farraday quietly; "he often does things for us-our poliey is to pu, palarize the best American artists."

Stefan was nomplused. Ledward illustrating Mary's rhymes! IIe felt uncomfortable.
"Don't you think he would get the right atmosphere bettur perhaps than anyone?" queried Farraday, who seemed courtcously anxious to elicit Stefan's opinion. Mary interposed hastily.
"Mr. Farraday, he can't answer you. I'm afraid I've been stupid, but I was so pessimistic about these verses that I wouldn't show them to him. I thought I would get an outside eriticism first, just to save my face," she hurried on, anxious in reality to save her husband's.
"I pleaded, but she was obdurate," contributed Stefan, looking at her with reproach.

Farraday smiled enlightenment. "I sce. Well, I slall hope you will change your mind about the illastrations when you have read the poems-that is, if your style would adapt itself. Now may I see the sketehes?" and he held out his hand for them.
Stefan rose with relief. Much as he adored Mary, he could not comprehend the serionsness with which this man was taking the rhymes whieh she herself had deseribed as "just little songs for ehildren." He was the more baffled as he could not dismiss Farraday's eritieal pretensions with eontempt, the editor being too obviously a man of eultivation. Now, however, that attention had been turned to his own work, Stefan was at his ease. Here, he felt, was no room for doubts.
"They are small chalk and ehareoal studies of the spirit of the eity-mere impressions," he explained, putting the drawings in Farraday's hauds with a gesture whiel belied the earelessness of his words.

Farraday glaneed at them, looked again, row, ... . car. ried them to the window, where he examined them carefully, one by one. Mary watehed him breathlessly, Stefan with uneoneealed triumph. Presently he turned again and placed them in a row on the bare expanse of his desk. He stood looking silently at them for a moment more before he spoke.
"Mr. Byrd," he said at last, "this is very remarkable work." Mary exhaled an audible breath of relief, and turned a glowing face to Stefan. "It is the most remarkable work," went on the editor, "that has come into this uffiee for some time past. Frankly, however, I can't use it."
Mary eaught her breath-Stefan stared. The other went on without looking at them:
"This eor.pany publishes strietly for the household. Jur poliey is to send into the average Ameriean home the best that America produces, but it must be a best that the home can comprehend. These drawings interpret New York as you sec it, but they do not interpret the New York in which our readers live, or one which they would be willing to admit existed."

106 THE NEST-BUILDER

"They interpret the real New York, though," interposed Stefan.
"Obviously so, to you," replied the editor, looking at him for the first time. "For me, they do not. These drawings are an arraignment, Mr. Byrd, and-if you will pardon my saying so-a rather bitter and inhuman one. You are not very patriotic, are you?" His keen eyes probed the artist.
"Emphatically no,"' Stefan rejoined. "I'm only half Amcrican by birth, and wholly French by adoption."
"That explains it," nodded Farraday gravely. "Well, Mr. Byrd, there are undoubtedly publications in which these drawings could find a place, and I am only sorry that mine are not amongst them. May I, however, venture to offcr you a suggestion?"

Stefan was beginning to look bored, but Mary interposed with a quick "Oh, please do!" Farraday turned to her.
"Mrs. Byrd, you will bear me out in this, I think. Your husband has genius-that is beyond question-but he is unknown here as yet. Would it not be a pity for him to be introduced to the American public through these rather sinister drawings? We are not fond of the too frank critic here, you know," he smiled, whimsically. "You may think me a Philistinc, Mr. Byrd," he continued, "but I have your welfare in mind. Win your public first with smiles, and later they may perhaps accept chastisement from you. If you have any drawings in a different vein I shall feel honored in publishing them'his tone was courteous-" if not, I should suggest that you seek your first opening through the galleries rather than the press. Whichever way you deeide, if I can assist you at all by furnishing introduetions, I do hope you will eall on me. Both for your wife's sake and for your own, it would be a pleasure. And now'-gathering up the drawings-"I must ask you both to excuse me, as I have a long string of appointnents. Mrs. Byrd, I will write you our offer for the verses. I don't know about the illustrations; you must eonsult your husband." They found themselves at the door bidding him goodbye: Mary with a sense of disappointment mingled with comprehension ; Stefan not knowing whether the more to deplore what he considered Farraday's Philistinism, or to admire his critieal acumen.
"His papers and his poliey are piffling," he summed up at last, as they walked down the Avenue, "but I must say I like the man himself-he is the first person of distinetion I have seen sinee I left Franee."
"Oh! Oh! The first?" queried Mary.
"Darling," he seized her hand and pressed it, "I said the first person, not the first immortal!" IIe had a way of bestowing little endearments in public, whieh Mary found very attraetive, even while her training obliged her to class them as soleeisms.
"I felt sure you would like him. He seems to me eharming," she said, withdrawing the hand with a smile. "Grundy!" he teased at this. "Yes, the man is all right, but if that is a sample of their attitude toward original work over here we have a pretty prospect of success. 'Genius, get thee behind me!' would sum it up. Imbeciles!" He strode on, his faee mutinous.

108

 'THE NES'T-BUILDERMary was thinking. She knew that Farraday's critieism of her hushand's work was just. The word "sinister" had struck home to her. It could be applied, she felt, with equal truth to all his large paintings but one -the Danaei.
"Stefan," she asked, "what did you think of his advice to win the public first by smiles?"
"'Temysonian!" pronounced Stefan, using what she knew to be his final adjective of eondemnation.
" A little Victorian, perhaps," she admitted, smiling at this suceinet repudiation. "Nevertheless, I'm inclined to think he was right. There is a sort of Paninspired terror in your work, you know.'"

He appeared struek. "Mary, I believe you've hit it!" he exclaimed, suddenly standing still. "I've never thought of it like that before-the thing that makes my work unique, $\vdots$ mean. Like the musie of Pan, it's outside humanity, because I am."
"Don't say that, dear," she interrupted, shocked.
"Yes, I am. I hate my kind-all except a handful. I love beauty. It is not my fault that humanity is ugly."

Mary was deeply disturbed. Led on by a ehance phrase of hers, he was actually boasting of just that lack whieh was beeoming her seeret fear for him. She touched his arm, pleadingly.
"Stefan, don't speak like that; it hurts me dreadfully. It is awful for any one to build up a barrier between himself and the world. It means mueh unhappiness, both for himself and others."

He laughed affectionately at her. "Why, sweet, what do we eare? I love you erough to make the balance true. You are on my side of the barrier, shutting me in witli beauty."
"Is that your only reason for loving me?" slie asked, still distressed.
"I love you because you have a beantiful body and a beautiful mind-because you are like a winged goddess of inspiration. Conld there be a more perfect reason?'"

Mary was silent. Again the burden of his ideal oppressed her. There was no eomfort in it. It might be above humanity, she felt, but it was not of it. Again her mind returned to the pietnres and Farraday's eriticism. "Sinister!" So he would have summed up all the others, except the Danaë. To that at least the word could not apply. Her heart lifted at the realization of how truly she had helped Stefan. In his tribute to her there was only beauty. She knew now that her gift must be without reservation.

Home again, she stood long before the pieture, searehing its strange face. Was she wrong, or did there linger even here the sinister, half-hnman note?
"Stefan," she said, ealling liim to her, "I was wrong to ask you not to make the face like me. It was stupid -'Tennysonian,' I'm afraid.'" She smiled bravely. "It is me-your ideal of me, at least-and I want you to make the face, too, express me as I seem to yon." She leant against him. "Then I want yon to exhibit it. I want yon to be known first by our gift to eaeh other, this-which is our love's triumph." She was trembling; her face quivered-he had never seen her so moved. She fired him.
"How glorious of yon, darling!" he exelaimed, "and oh, how beautifnl you look! You have never been so wouderful. If I could paint that rapt face! Quick, I believe I ean get it. Stand there, on the throne." II seized his pallette and brushes and worked furiously while Mary stood, still flaming with her renunciation. In a few minutes it was done. IIe ran to her and covered her face with kisses. "Come and look!" he cried exultingy, holding her before the cinvas.

110 THE NEST-BUILDER

The strange face with its too-wide eyes and exotic mouth was gone. Instead, she saw her own purely cut feaiures, but fired by such exultant adoration as lifted them to the likeness of a deity. The pieture now was incredibly pure and passionate-the vary faming essence of love. Tears started to her eyes and dropped unheeded. She turned to hin worshiping.
"Beloved,'" she eried, "you are great, great. I adore yon," and she kissed him passionately.

He had painted love's apotleosis, and his genius had raised her love to its level. At that moment Mary's actually was the soul of flame he had depicted it.

That day, illumined by the inspiration each had given each, was destined to mark a turning point in their common life. The next morning the understanding which Mary lrad for long instinctively feared, and against which she had raised a barrier of silenee, came at last.

She was standing for some final work on the Danaë, but she had awakened feeling rather unwell, and her pose was listless. Stefan noticed it, and she braced herself by an effort, ouly to droop again. To his surprise, she had to ask for her rest much sooner than usual ; he nad hitherto found her tireless. But hardly had she again taken the pose than she felt herself turning giddy. She tottered, and sat down limply on the throne. He ran to her, all coneern.

MATED

"Why, darling, what's the matter, aren't you well?" She shook her head. "What can be. wrong?" She looked at him specehless.
"What is it, dearest, has anything upset you?" he went on with-it seemed to her-ineredible blindness.
"I ean't stand in that pose any longer, Stefan; this must be the last time," she said at length, slowly.

He looked at her as she sat, pate-faced, drooping on the edge of the throne. Suddenly, in a flash, realization came to him. He strode across the room, looked again, and came back to her.
"Why, Mary, are you going to have a baby?" he asked, quite baldy, with a surprised and almost rueful expression.
Mary flushed erimson, tears of emotion in her eyes. "Oh, Stefan, yes. I've known it for weeks; haven't you guessed?"' Ifer arms reached to him blindly.
He stood rooted for a minute, looking as dumfounded ${ }^{\circ}$ as if an earthquake had rolled under him. Then with a quiek turn he pieked up her wrap, folded it round her, and took her into his arms. But it was a moment too late. He had hesitated, had not been there at the instant of her greatest need. IIer midnight fears were fulfilled, just as her instinct had foretold. Ine was not glad. There in his arms her heart turned cold. .

He soon rallied; kissed her, comforted her, told her what a fool he had been; but all he said only confirmed her knowledge. "He is not glad. He is not glad," her heart beat out over and over, as he talked.
"Why did you not tell me sooner, darling? Why did you let ine tire you like this?" he asked.

Impossible to reply. "Why didn't you know?" her heart cried out, and, "I wasn't tired until to-day," her lips answered.

112 THE NEST'-BUILDER

"IBut why didn't you tell me?" he urged. "I never even gruessed. It was idhotie of me, but I was so abs. sorbed in our love and my work that this neve came to my mind."
"13ut at first, Stefan?" she questioned, probing for the answer she already knew, but still clinging to the hope of being wrong. "I never talked nhout it beanuse you didn't seem to care. But in the begiming, when you proposed to me-the thy we were married-at Shadeham-did you never think of it then?" Her tone eraved reassurance.
"Why, no," he half laughed. "You'll think me ehildish, but I never did. I suppose I vaguely faeed the possibility, but I put it from me. We had each other and our love-that seemed emongh."

She raised her head and gazed at him in wide-eyed pain. "But, stesa.., what's marriage for?" she exclained.

He puekered his brows, puzzled. "Why, my dear, it's for love-eompanionship-inspiration. Nothing more so far as I an concerned." They stared nakedly at cach other. For the first time the veils were stripped away. They had felt themselves one, and behold! here was a barrict, impenetrable as marble, dividing each from the comprehension of the other. To Stefan it was ineonceivable that a marriage should be hased on anything but mutual desire. To Mary the thonght of marriage apart from children was an impossibility. They had come to their first spiritual deadlock.

VIII

LOVE, feeling its fusion threatened, ever makes a supreme effort for remity. In the days that followed, Stefan enthusiastically songht to rebuild his image of Mary round the centrul fact of her mater. nity. He became inspired with the idea of painting her as a Madonna, and recalled all the famons artists of the past who had so glorified their hearts' mistresses.
"Yoll are named for the greatest of all mothers, dearest, and my pieture shall be worthy of the name," he wonld ery. Or he would eall her Aphrodite, the mother of Love. "How beautifill our son will be-another Eros," he exclaimed.

Mary rejnieed in his new enthusiasm, and persuaded herself that his indifference to children was merely the result of his lonely bachelorhood, and wonld disappear forever at the sight of his own ehild. Now that her great seeret was shared she became happier, and openly commenced those preparations which she had long been cherishing in thought. Miss Mason was sent for, and the great news eonfided to her. They undertook several shopping expeditions, as a result of which Mary would sit with a pile of sewing on her knee while Stefan worked to complete his pieture. Miss Mason took to dropping in occasionally with a pattern or some trifle of wool or silk. Mary was always glad to see her, and even Stefan found himself laughing sometimes at her shrewd New England wit. For the most part, however, he ignored her, while he painted away in silenee belind the great canvas.

114 THE NEST-BUILDER

Mary had received twelve dollars for eaeh of her verses -ninety-six dollars in all. Before Christmas Stefan sold his pastoral of the daneing faun for one hundred and twenty-five, and Mary felt that financially they were in smooth water, and ventured to disuuss the possibility of larger quarters. For these they were both eager, having begin to feel the confinement of their single room; but Mary urged that they postpone moving until spring.
"We are warm and snug here for the winter, and by spring we shall have saved something substantial, and really be able to spread out," she argued.
"Very well, wise one, we will hold in our wings a litthe longer," he agreed, "but when we do fly, it must be high." IIis brush soared in illustration.

She had diseussed with him the matter of the illustrations for her verses as soon as she received her eheque from Farraday. They had agreed that it would be a pity for him to take time for them from his masterpiece.
"Besides, sweetheart," he had said, "I honestly think Ledward will do them better. His stuff is very graceful, without being sentimental, and he understands ehildren, which I'm afraid I don't." He shrugged regretfully.
"Didn't you paint that adorable lost baby?" she reminded him. "I've always grieved that we had to sell it."
"I'll buy it back for you, or paint you another better one," he offered promptly.

So the verses went to Ledward, and the first three appeared in the Christmas number of The Child at Home, illustrated--as even Stefan had to admit-with great beauty.

MATED

Mary would have given infinitely much for his collaboration, but she had not urged it, feeling he was right in his refusal.

As Christmas approached they began to make acfuaintances among the polyglot population of the neighborhood. Their old hotel, the culinary aristocrat of the district, possessed a café in which, with true Freneli hospitality, patrons were permitted to occupy tables indefinitely on the strength of the slenderest orders. Here for the sake of the French atmosphere Stefan would have dined nightly had Mary's frugality permitted. As it was, they began to eat there two or three nights a week, and dropped in after dimner on many other nights. They would sit at a bare ronnd table smoking their cigarettes, Mary with a eup of coffee, Stefan with the ligueur he could never induce her to share, and watching the groups that dotted the other tables. Or they would linger at the cheapest of their restaurants and listen to the conversation of the young people, argressively revolutionary, who formed its elientèle. These last were always noisy, and assumed as a pose manners even worse than those they natnrally possessed. Every one talked to every one else, regardless of introductions, and Stefan had to summon his most ernshing manner to prevent Mary from being monopolized by varions very youthful and visionary men who openly admired her. Ife was inclined to abandon the place, but Mary was amused by it for a time, bohemianism being a completely unknown quantity to her.
"I've had sevk this is the real thing," he explained; a very crass imitation."
"Imitation or not, it's most delightfully absurd and amusing," said she, watching the group nearest her. This consisted of a very short and rotund man with hair à la Paderewski and a frilled evening shirt, a thin man of incredible stature and lank black locks, and a pretty young girl in a tunie, a tam o' shanter, enormous green hairpins, and tiny patent-leather shoes decorated with three inch heels. To her the lank man, who wore a red velvet shirt and a khaki-colored suit reminiscent of Mr. Bernard Shaw, was explaining the difference between syndicalism and trade-unionism in the same conversational tone which men in Lindum lad used in deseribing to Mary the varying excellenees of the two local hunts. "I. W. W." and "A. F. of L.". fell from his lips as "MI. F. II." and "J. P." used to from theirs. The contrast between the two worlds entertained her not a little. She thought all these young people looked clever, though singularly vulgar, and that her old friends would have appeared by comparison refreshingly clean and cultivated, but quite stupid.

116 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Why, Stefan, are dull, correct people always so clean, and elever and original ones usually so unwashed?" she wondered.
"Oh, the unwashed stage is like the measles," he replied; "you are bound to catch it in early life."
"I suppose that's true. I know even at Oxford the Freshmen go through an utterly ragged and disreputable phase, in which they like to pretend they have no laundry bill."
"Yes, it advertises their emaneipation. I went through it in Paris, but mine was a light case."
"And brief, I should think," smiled Mary, to whom Stefan's feline perfection of neatness was one of his charms.

MATED

At the hotel, on the other liand, the groups, though equally individual, laeked this harum-scarum quality, and, if oceasicnally noisy, were elean and orderly.
"Is it beeause they ean afford to dress better?" Mary asked on their next evening there, noting the eontrast.
"No," said Stefan. "That velvet shirt cost as much probably as half a dozen eotton ones. These people have more, eertainly, or they wouldn't be here-but the real reason is that they are a little older. The other erowd is ray with youth. These have begun to find themselves; they don't need to advertise their opinions on their persons." IIe was looking about him with quite a friendly eye.
"You don't seem to hate humanity this evening, Stefan,", Mary eommented.
"No," he grimned. "I eonfess these people are less objeetionable than most." He spoke in rapid Freneh to the waiter, ordering another drink.
"And the language," he eontinued. "If you knew what it means to me to hear French!"

Mary nodded rather ruefully. Her Freneh was of the British sehool-girl variety, grammatieally precise, but with a hopeless, insular accent. After a few attempts Stefan had eeased trying to speak it with her. "Darling," be had begged, "don't let us-it is the only ugly sound you make."

One by one they came to know the habitués of these plaees. In the restaurant Stefan was detested, but +olerated for the sake of his wife. "Beauty and the Beast" they were dubbed. But in the hotel eafé he made himself more agreeable, and was liked for his eharming appearanee, his fluent Freneh, and his quiek mentality. The "Villagers," as these people called themselves, owing to th. ir proximity to New York's old Greenwich Village, admired Mary with ardor, and liked her, but for a time were baffed by her innate English reserve. Mentally they stood round her like a litter of yearling pups about a stranger, sniffing and wagging friendly but uneertain tails, doubtful whether to advance with affeetionate fawnings or to withdraw to safety. This was particularly true of the men-the women, finding Mary a staneh Feminist, and feeling for her the sympathy a bride always commands frois: her sex, took to her at once. The revolutionary group on the other hand would have broken throu.gh her pleasant aloofness with the forceand twice the spe d-of a MeEwan, had Stefan not, with them, adoptcr? the rôle of snarling watchdog.

118 THE NEST-BUILDER

One of Mary's nrst after dinner friendships was made at the hotel with a certain Mrs. Elliott, who turned out to be the President of the local Suffiage Club. Seenting a new reeruit, this lady early engaged the Byrds in conversation and, finding Mary a believer, at onee enveloper her in the camaraderie which has been this eanse's gift to women all the world over. They exehanged calls, and soon beeame firm friends.

Mrs. Elliot was an attractive woman in middle life, of slim, graceful figure and vivacions manner. She had one son out in the world, and one in college, and lived in a charming loouse just off the Avenue, with an adored but generally invisible husband, who was engaged in business downtown. As a girl Constance Elliot had been on the stage, and lad played smaller Shakespearean parts in the old Daly Company, but, bowing to the code of her generation, had abandoned lier profession at marriage Now, in middle life, too old to take up her ealling again with any hope of suecess, yet with her mental activity unimpaired, she found in the Suffrage movement ber one serious vocation.
"I am nearly fifty, Mrs. Byrd," she said to Mary, "and have twenty good years before me. I like my friends, and am interested in philanthropy, but I am not a Jaek-of-all-trades by temperament. I need work-a real job such as I had when the boys were little, or when I was a girl. We are all working hard ellough to win the vote, but what we shall fill the hole in our time with when we have it, I don't know. It will be casy for the younger ones-but I suppose women like myself will simply have to pay the price of having been born of our generation. Some will find solace as grandmothers-I hope I shall. But my elder son, who married a pretty society girl, is childless, and my younger sueh a lighthearted young raseal that I doubt if he marries for years to eome."

Mary was much interested in this problem, whieh seemed more salient here than in her own class in England, in whieh social life was a vocation for ioth sexes.

At Mrs. Elliot's house she met many of the neighborhood's more conventional women, and began to have a great liking for these gently bred but broad-minded and demoeratic Americans. She also met a mixed collection of artists, actresses, writers, reformers and followers of various "isms"; for as president of a suffrage elub it was Mrs. Elliot's poliey to make her udwing rooms a eenter for the whole neighborhood. She was a eharming hostess, combining diserimination with breadth of view; her Fridays were rallying days for the followers of many more cults than she would ever embrace, but for none toward which she could not feel tolerance.
At first Stefan, who, man-like, professed contempt for

120

 THE NEST-BUILDERsoeial funetions, refused to aecompany Mary to these athomes. But after Mrs. Elliot's visit to the studio he eonceived a great liking for lier, and to Mary's delight volunteered to aecompany her on the following Frida, Few misantliropes are proof against an atmosphere of adulation, and in this Mrs. Elliot enveloped Stefan from the moment of first seeing lis Danaë. She introduced hinn as a genius-Ameriea's eoming great painter, and he frankly enjoyed the novel sensation of being lionized by a group of elever and attractive women.

Mrs. Elliot aftected house gowns of unusual texture and design, which flowed in adroitly veiling lines about her too slim form. These imnediately attracted the attention of Stefan, who coveted something equally original for Mary. He remarked on them to his hostess on his seeond visit.
"Yes," she said, "I love them. I am eclipsed by fashionable elotling. Feiicity l3erber designs all my things. She's ruinous," with a sigh, "but I have to have her. I am a iool at dressing myself, but I have intelligenee enough to know it," she added, laughing.
"Felieity Berber," questioned Stefan. "Is that a creature with Mongolian eyes and an O-shaped mouth?"
"What a good description! Yes-lave you met her?"
"I haven't, but you will arrange it, won't you?" he asked eajolingly. "I saw a drawing of her-she's tremendously paintable. Do tell me about her. Wait a minute. I'll get my wife!'"

He jumped up, pouneed on Mary, who was in a group by the tea-table, and bore her off regardless of her interrupted eonversation.
"Mary," he explained, all excitement, "you remember that pieture at the magazine offiee? Yes, you do, a girl with slanting black eyes-Felieity Berber. Well, she isn't an actress after all. Sit down here. Mrs. Elliot is going to tell us about her." Mary complied, sharing their hostess' sofa, while Stefan wrapped himself round a stool. "Now begin at the beginning," he demanded, beaning; "I'm thrilled about her."
"Well," said Mrs. Elliot, dropping a string of jade beads through her fingers, "so are most people. She's unique in her way. She came here from the Pacific coast, I believe, quite unknown, and trailing an impossible husband. That was five years ago-she couldn't have been more than tweinty-three. She daneed in the Dunean manner, but was too lazy to keep it up. Then she went into the movies, and her face beeame the rage; it was on all the pieture posteards. She got royalties on every photograph sold, and made quite a lot of money, I believe. But she hates aetive work, and soon gave the movies up. About that time the appalling husband disappeared. I don't know if she divoreed him or not, but he ceased to be, as it were. His name was Noaks." She paused. "Does this bore you?" she asked Mary.
"On the contrary," smiled she, "it's most amusinglike the penny novelettes they sell in England."
"Olympian superiority!" teased Stefan. "Please go on, Mrs. Elliot. Did slie attaeh another husband?"
"No, she says she hates the bother of them," laughed their hostess. "Men are always falling in love with her, but-openly at least-she seems uninterested in them."
"Hasn't found the right one, I suppose," Stefan interjeeted.
"Perhaps that's it. At any rate her young men are always confiding their woes to me. My status as a potential grandmother makes me a suitable repository for such seerets."

122  THE NEST-BJILDER

"Ridiculous," Stefan commented.
"But true, alas!" she laughed. "Well, Felicity had always designed the gowns for her dancing and acting, and after the elimination of Mr. Noaks she set up a dressmaking establishment for artistic and individual gowns. She opened it with a the dansant, at which she discoursed on the art of dress. Her showroom is like a sublimated hotel lohby-tea is served there for visitors every afternoon. Her prices are high, and she has made a huge suceess. She's wonderfully clever, directs everything herself. Felieity detests exertion, but she has the art of making others work for her."
"That sounds as if she would get fat," said Stefan, with a shudder.
"Doesn't it?" agreed Mrs. Elliot. "But she's as slim as a panther, and intensely alive nervously, for all her physical laziness."
"Do you like her?" Mary asked.
"Yes, I really do, though she's terribly rude, and I tell her I'm convinced she's a dangerous person. She gives me a feeling that gunpowder is secreted somewhere in the room with her. I will get her here to meet you both-you would be interested. She's never free in the afternoon; we'll make it an evening." With a confirming nod, Mrs. Elliot rose to greet some neweomers.
"Mary," Stefan whispered, "we'll go and order you a dress from this person. Wouldn't that be fun?"
"How sweet of you, dearest, but we can't afford it," replied Mary, surreptitiously patting his hand.
"Nonsense, of course we can. Aren't we going to be rich?" scoffed he.
"Look who's coming!" exelaimed Mary suddenly. Farraday was shaking hauds with their hostess, his tall frame looking more than ever distinguished in its correct cutaway. Almost instantly he caught sight of Mary and crossed the room to her with an expression of keen pleasure.
"How delightful," he greeted them bot!. "So you have fomd the presidinge genius of the district! Why did I not have the inspiration of introducing rou myself?" Ile turned to Mrs. Elliot, who had rejoined them. "Two more lions for you, el, Constance" ' he said, with a twinkle whith betokened old friendship.
"Yes, indeed," she smiled, "they have no rivals for my Art and lienuty cages."
"And what about the literary circus? I suppose you have been makinir Ilrs. Byrd roar overtime?"

Their hostess looked puzzied.
"Don't tell me that you are in ignorance of her status as the IIouseliold Company's latest find?" he ejaculated in mook dismay.

Mrs. Elliot turned reproachful eyes on Mary. "She never told me, the unfriendly woman!"
"Just retribution, Constance, for poring over your propagandist sheets instead of reading our wholesome literature," Farraday retorted. "IIad you done your duty by the Household magazines you would have needed no telling."
"A hit, a palpable hit," she answered, laughing. "Which reminds me that I want another article from you, James, for our Woman Citizen."
"Mrs. Byrd," said Farraday, "behold in me a driven slave. Won't you come to my rescue and write something for this insatiable suffragist?"

Mary shook her head. "No, no, Mr. Farraday, I can't argne, either personally or on paper. You should hear me trying to make a sperech! I'athetic."

Stefan, who had ceased to follow the conversation, and was restlessly examining prints on the wall, turned at this. "Don't do it, dearest. Arerment is so unbeautiful, and I couldn't stand your doing anything badly." He drifted away to a group of women who were disenssing the Italian Futnrists.
"Tell me about this lion, James," said Constanee, settling herself on the sofa. "I believe she is too modest to tell me herself." She looked at Mary affectionately.
'She has written a second 'Child's Garden,' almost rivaling the first, and e have a child's story of hers which will be as popilar as some of Frances ilodgsou Burnett's,' summed up Farraday.

Mary blushed with pleasure at this praise, bri was about to deprecate it when Stefan cimaled her away. "Mary," he called, "I want you to the ais I an saying about the Cubists!" She left them with a little smile of exense, and they watched her tall figure join her husband.
"James," said Mrs. Elliot irrelevantly, "why in the world don't you mary?",
"Because, Constance," he smiled, "all the women I most admire in the world are already married."
"À propos, have you seen Mr. Byrd's work?" she asked.
"Only some drawings, from which I suspect him of genius. But she is as gifted in her way as he, only it's a smaller way."
"Don't place hinn till you've seen his big picture, inted from her. It's tremendous. We've got to have it exhibited at Constantine's. I want you to help me arrange it for them. She's inexperiented, and he's helplessly mpractical. Oh!" she grasped his arm; "a splendid idea! Why shoukh't 1 have a private exhibition here first, for the benefit of the Canse?"

MATED

Farraday threw up his hamds. "You are indefatigable, Constance. We'd better all leave it to you. The Bereds and Suftrage will benefit cually, I am sure."
"I will arrange it," she nodded smiling, hur eyes narrowing, her slim hands dropping the jade beats from one to the other.
Farraday, knowing her for the moment lost to everything save her latest piece of stage management, keft her, and joined the Byrds. Ite engaged himself to visit their studio the following week.

IX

MISS MASON was folding her knitting, and Mary sat in the firelight sewing diligently. Stefan was out in seareh of paints.
"I tell you what 'tis, Mary Elliston Byrd," said Miss Mason. "It's 'bout time you suw a doctor. My mothere was a physieian-honseopath, one of the first that ever graduated. Take my advice, and have a woman."
"I'd much rather," said Mary.
"I should say!"' agreed the other. "I never was one to be against the mem, but oh, my-" she threw up her bony little hands-"if there's one thing I never conld abide it's a man doctor for woman's work. I s'pose I got started that way by what my mother told me of the medical students in rer day. Anyway, it hardly seems Cliristian to me for a woman to go to a man doctor."

Mary laughed. "I wish my dear old Dad enuld have heard you. I remenber he once refused to meet a woman doctor in eonsultation. She had to leave Lindum-no one would employ her. I was a child at the time, but even then it seemed all wrong to me."
"My dear, you thank the Lord you live under the Stars and Stripes," re.joined Miss Mason, who conceived of England. as a place beyond the reach of liberty for either women or men.
"I shall live under the Trieolor if Stefin has his way," smiled Mary.
"Child," said her visitor, putting on her hat, "den't say it. Your husband's an elegant man-I adnire him -but don't you ever let me hear he doesn't love his country."
"I'm certainly learning to love it myself," Mary discrectly evaded.
"You're too tine a woman not to," retorted the other. "Now I tell you. I've bech treated for my chast at the Women's and Chiddren's Hospital. Thate's onn. little doctor there 's chte 's she can be. I'men enin' ton get you her address. You've got to trat yourself right. Good-bye," nodded the littse woman, and was grone in her usual brisk fashion.

It was the day of Mr. Fiarradiy's expected call, and Miss Mason had hardly departed when the bell rang. Mary hastily put away her sewing and pressed the elece trie button which opened the duwnstains door to visitoms. She wished stofan were back agrain to help her entertain the editor, and greeted hins with apologies for her lonsband 's absence. She was anxions that this man, whom she instinctively liked and trinsted, shonld see her hasband at his best. Scating Farradey in the Morris chair, she got him some tea, while he looked about with interest.

The two big pictures, "Tempest," and "Pursuit," now hung stretehed but muframeal, on either side of the room. Farraday's gaze kept returning to them.
"Those are his Beanx Arts pictures; extraordinary, aren't they?" said Mary, following his eyes.
"They eertainly are. Remarkabl? powerful. I understand there is another, thongh, that he has only just finished?"
"Yes, it's on the easel, covered, you see," slie answered. "Stefan must have the honor of showing you that himself."

128 THE NEST-BUILDER

"I wish you would tell me, Mrs. Byrd," said Farraday, changing the subject, "how you happened to write those verses? Had you been brought up with ehildren, younger brothers and sisters, for instance?"
Mary shook her head. "No, I'n the younger of two. But I've always loved ehildren more than anything in the world." She blushed, and Farraday, watehing her, realized for the first time what a certain heightened radianee in her face betokened. He smiled very sweetly at her. She in her turn saw that he knew, and was glad. His manner seemed to enfold her in a mantle of comfort and understanding.

As they finished their tea, Stefan arrived. He entered gaily, greeted Farraday, and fell upon the tea, consuming two eups and several sliees of bread and butter with the rapid eoneentration he gave to all his aets.
That finished, he leaped up and made for the easel.
"Now, Farraday," he eried, "you are going to see one of the finest modern paintings in the world. Why should I be modest about it? I'm not. It's a master-pieee-Mary's and mine!"

Mary wished he had not ineluded her. Though determined to overeonie the feeling, she still shrank from having the pieture shown in her presence. Farraday placed himself in position, and Stefan threw back the eloth, watehing the other's faee with eagerness. The effeet surpassed his expeetation. The editor flushed, then gradually beeame quite pale. After a minute he turned rather abruptly from the eanvas and faeed Stefan.
"You are right, Mr. Byrd," he said, in an obviously controlled voiee, "it is a masterpieee. It will make your name and probably your fortune. It is one of the most magnifieent modern paintings I have ever seen."

MATED

Mary beamed.
"'Your praise honors me," said Stefan, genuinely delighted.
"I'm sorry I have to run away now," Farraday eontinued almost hurriedly. "You know what a busy man I am." He shook hands with Stefan. "A thousand congratulations," he said. "Good-bye, Mrs. Byrd; I enjoyed my eup of tea with you immensely." The hand he offered her was cold; he hardly looked up. "You will let me have some more stories, won't you? I shall count on them. Good-bye again-my warmest eongratulations to you both," and he took his departure with a suddenness only saved from precipitation by the deliberate poise of his whole personality.
"I'm sorry he had to go so soon," said Mary, a little blankly.
"What got into the man?" Stefan wondered, thrusting his hands into his poekets. "He was leisurely enough till he had seen the pieture. I tell you what!", he exelaimed. "Did you notiee his expression when he looked at it? I believe the chap is in love with you!", He turned his most impish and mischievous faee to her.

Mary blushed with annoyanee. "How perfeetly ridiculous, Stefan! Please don't say sueh things."
"But he is!" He daneed about the room, hugely en. tertained by his idea. "Don't you see, that is why he is so eager about your verses, and why he was so bouleversé by the Danaë! Poor chap, I feel quite sorry for him. You must be niee to him."

Mary was thoroughly annoyed. "Please don't talk like that," she reiterated. "You don't know how it hurts when you are so flippant. If you suggest sueh a reason for his aeceptance of my work, of course I ean't send in any more." Tears of vexation were in her eyes.

130

"Darling, don't be absurd," he responded, teasingly. "Why shouldn't he be in love with you? I expect everybody to be so. As for your verses, of course he wouldn't take them if they weren't good; I didn't mean that."
"Then why did you say it?' she asked, uuplaeated.
"Dearest!" and he kissed her. "Don't be dignified; be Aplirodite again, not Pallas. I never mean anything I say, exeept when I say I love you!"
"Love isn't the only thing, Stefan," she replied.
"Isn't it? What else is there? I don't know," and he jumped on the table and sat smiling there with his head on one side, like a naughty little boy facing his sehoolmaster.

She wanted to answer "comprehension," but was silent, feeling the uselessness of further words. How expeet understanding of a common human hurt from this being, who alternately appeared in the guise of a god and a gamin? She remembered the old tale of the maiden wedded to the beautiful and strange elf-king. Was the legend symbolic of that mysterious threadcall it genius or what you will-that runs its erratic course through humanity's woof, marring yet illuminating the staid design, never straightened with its fellowthreads, never tied, and never to be followed to its source? With the feeling of having for an instant held in her hand the key to the riddle of his nature, Mary went to Stefan and ran her fingers gently through his hair.
"Child," she said, smiling at him rather sadly; and "Beautiful," he responded, with a prompt kiss.

X

THE next morning brought Constance Elliot, primed with a complete scheme for the futur of the Danaë. She found Mary busy with her sewing and Stefan rather restlessly cleaning his pallette and brushes. The great picture was propped against the wall, a smaller empty eanvas being serewed on the easel. Stefan greeted her enthusiastically.
"Come in!' he cried, forestalling Mary. "You find us betwixt and between. She's finished," indicating the Danaë, "and I'm thinking of doing an interior, with Mary seated. I don't know," he went on thoughtfully; "it's quite out of my usual line, but we're too donestic here just now for anything else." His tone was slightly grumbling. From the rocking chair Coustance smiled importantly on them both. She had the happy faculty of never appearing to hear what should not have been expressed.
"Children," she said, "your immediate future is arranged. I have a plan for the proper presentation of the inasterpiece to a waiting world, and I haven't been responsible for two suffrage matinées and a mile of the Parade for nothing. I understand publicity. Now listen."

She outlined her seheme to them. The reporters were to be sent for and informed that the great new American painter, sensation of this year's Salon, had kindly consented to a private exhibition of his masterpiece at her house for the benefit of the Cause. Tickets, one dollar each, to be limited to two hundred.

132 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Then a bit about your both being Suffragists, and about Mary's writing, you know,' she threw in. "Note the valuc of the limited sale-at onec it becomes a privilege to be there." Tickets, she went on to explain, would be sent to the art eritics of the newspapers, and Mr. Farraday would arrange to get Constantine himself and one or two of the big private connoisseurs. She personally knew the curator of the Mctropolitan, and would get him. The press notices would be followed be special letters and articles by some of these men. Then Constantine would announce a two wecks' exhibition at his gallery, the public would floek, and the picture would be bought by one of the big millionaires, or a gallery. "I've arranged it all," she concluded triumphantly, looking from one to the other with her dark alert glance.

Stefan was grinning delightcdly, his attention for the moment completcly captured. Mary's sewing had dropped to her lap; she was round-eyed.
"But the sale itself, Mrs. Elliot, you ean hardly have arranged that?' she laughed.

Constance waved her hand. "That arranges itself. It is enough to set the machinery in motion."
"Do you mean to say," went on Mary, half ineredulous, "that you ean simply send for the reporters and get them to write what you want?"
"Within reason, certainly," answered the other. "Why not?"
"In England," Mary laughed, "if a moman were to do that, unless she were a duchess, a Pankhurst, or a great actress, they wouldn't even come."

Constance dismissed this with a shrug. "Ah, well, my dear, luckily we're not in England! I'm going to begin to-day. I only came over to get your permission. Let me see-this is the sixteenth-too near Christınas. I'll have the tiekets printed and the press announeement prepared, and we'll let them go in the dead week after Christmas, when the papers are thankful for eopy. We'll exhibit the first Saturday in the New Year. For a week we'll have follow-up articles, and then Constantine will take it. You blessed people," and she rose to go, "don't have any anxiety. Suffragists alway's put things through, and I shall eoneentrate on this for the next three weeks. I consider the picture sold."

Mary tried to express her gratitude, but the other waved it aside. "I just love you both," she eried in her impulsive way, "and want to see you where you ought to be-at the top!" She shook hands with Stefan effusively. "Mrind you get on with your next pieture!" she eried in parting; "every one will be clamoring for your work!"
"Oh, Stefan, isn't it awfully good of her?" exelaimed Mary, linking her arm through his. He was staring at his empty eanvas. "Yes, splendid," he responded earclessly, "but of eourse she'll have the kudos, and her organization will benefit, too."
"Stefan!" Mary dropped his arm, dumfounded. It was not possible he should be so ungenerous. She would have remonstrated, but saw he was oblivious of her.
"Yes," he went on absently, looking from the room to the eanvas, "it's fine for every one all round-just as it should be. Now, Mary, if you will sit over there by the fire and take your sewing, I think I'll try and bloek in that Dutch interior effect I notieed some time back.

134 THE NEST-BUILDER

The light is all wrong, but I ean get the thing composed."
He was lost in his new idea. Mary told herself she had in part misjudged him. Ilis emmment on their friend's assistance was not dictated by iack of appreciation so mnelı as by indifference. No sooner was the picture's futme settled than he had ceased to be interested in it. The practical results of its sale would have little real meaning for him, sle knew. She began to see that all he asked of humanity was that it should leave him untrammeled to do his work, while yielding him full measnre of the beauty and acelamation that were his food. "Well," she thouglt, " 1 'm the wife of a genius. It's a great privilege, but it is strange, for I always snpposed if I married it would simply be some good, kind nan. IIe would have been very dull," she smiled to herself, mentally contrasting the imagined with the real.

A few days before Christmas Mary noticed that one of the six skyscraper studies was gone from the studio. She spoke of it, fearing the possibility of a theft, but Stefan nurimured rather vaguely that it was all righthe was having it framed. Also, on three consecutive mornings she awakened to find lim busily painting at a small easel close under the window, whieh he would hastily eover on hearing her move. As he evidently did not wish her to see it, she wisely restrained her euriosity. She was lerself busy with various little seerets-there was some knitting to be done whenever his back was turned, and she had made several shopping expeditions. On Christmas Eve Stefan was gone the whole afternoon, and retmened radiant, full of absurd jokes and quivers of suppressed glen. He was evidently highly pleased with himself, but cherished with tonehing faith, she thought, the illusion that his mamer betrayed nothing.

That night, when she was supposed to be asleep, she felt him creep carefully out of bed, heard him fumbling for his dressing gown, and saw a shaft of light as the studio door was eautiously opened. A moment later a rustling sounded through the transom, followed by the shrill whisper of Madame Corriani. Listening, she fell asleep.

She was wakened by Stefan's arms round her.
"A happy Christmas, darling! So wonderful-the first Christmas I ever remember celebrating."

There was a ruddy glow of firelight in the room, but to her opening eyes it secmed unusually dark, and in a moment she saw that the great piece of Chinese silk they used for their couch cover was stretelied across the room on cords, shutting off the window end. She jumped up hastily.
"Oh, Stefan, how thrilling!" she exclaimed, girlishly exeited. As for him, he was standing before her dressed, and obviously tingling with inpatience. She slipped into a dressing gown of white silk, and eaught her hair loosely up. Simultaneously Stefan emerged from the kitchenette with two steaming cups of eoffec, which he placed on a table before the fire.
"Clever boy!" slie exelaimed delighted, for he had never made the eoffee before. In a moment he produced rolls and butter.
"Déjeuner first," he proclaimed gleefully, "and then the smrprise!" They ate their meal as excitedly as two ehildren. In the midst of it Mary rose and, fetehing from the bureau two little ribhon-tied pareels, placed them in his hands.
"For me? More exeitements!" he warbled. "But I shan't open them till the curtain comes down. There, we've finished." ITe jumped up. "Beautiful, allow me

136

 THE NEST-BUILDERto present to you the Byrds' Christmas tree." With a dramatic gesture lie unhooked a cord. The curtain fell. There in the full morning light stood a tree, difierent from any Mary had ever seen. There were no candles on it, but from top to bottom it was all one glittering white. There were no garish tinsel ornaments, but from every branch hung a white bird, wings outstretelied, and under each bird lay, on the branch below, something white. At the foot of the tree stood a little painting framed in pale silver. It was of a nude baby boy, sitting wonderingly upon a hilltop at early dawn. His eyes were lifted to the sky, his liands groped. Mary, with an exclamation of delight, stepped nearer. Then she saw what the white things were under the spreading wings of the birds. Each was the appurtenance of a baby. One was a tiny cap, one a cloak, others were dresses, little jackets, vests. There were some tiny white socks, and, at the very top of the tree, a rattle of white coral and silver.
"Oh, Stefan, my dearest-'the little white bird'!" she cried.
"Do you like it, darling?" he asked delightedly, his arms about her. "Mrs. Elliot told me about Barrie's white bird-I hadn't known the story. But I wanted to show you I was glad about ours," he held her close, "and directly she spoke of the bird, I thought of this. She went with me to get those little things--" he waved at the tree-"some of them are from her. But the picture was quite my own idea. It's right, isn't it? What you would fecl, I mean? I tried to get inside your heart."

She nodded, her eyes shining with tears. She could find no words to tell him how deeply she was touched.

Ifer half-formed doubts were swept away-he was her own dear man, kind and eomprehending. She took the little painting and sat with it on her knee, poring over it, Stefan standing by delighted at his suceess. Then he remembered his own parcels. The larger he opened first, and instantly domed one of the two knitted ties it held, proclaiming its golden brown vastly becoming. The smaller pareel contained a tiny jeweler's hox, and in it Stefan found an old and heary seal ring of pure design, set with a transparent greenish stone, which bore the intaglio of a winged head. He was enchanted.
"Mary, you wonder," he eried. "Yon must have created this-you couldn't just have found it. It symbolizes what you have given me-sums up all that you are!" and he kissed her rapturously.
"Oh, Stefan," she answered, "it is all perfect, for your gift symbolizes what you have brought to me!",
"Yes, darling, but not all I an to you, I hope," he replied, rubbing his cheek against hers.
"Foolish one," she smiled back at him.
They spent, a sompletely happy day, rejoieing in the suecessful atce: gı us each to penetrate the other’s mind. They had neve?, even on their honeymoon, felt more at one. Later, Ma'y asked him about the missing sketeh.
"Yes, I sold $i$ i for the bird's trappings," he answered gleefully; "wasn't it elever of me? But don't ask me for the horrid details, and don't tell me a word about my wonderful ring. I prefer to consider that you fetched it from Olympus."

And Mary, whose practical conscience had given her sharp twinges over her extravagance, was glad to let it rest at that.

During the morning a great sheaf of roses eame for

138 THE NEST-BUILDER

Mary with the card of James Farraday, and on its heels a bush of white heather inseribed to them both from McEwan. The postman eontributed several cards, and a tiny string of pink coral from Miss Mason. "How kind every one is!'" Mary cried happily.

In the afternoon the Corrianis were summoned. Mary had small presents for them and a glass of wine, whieh Stefan poured to the aeeompaniment of a song in his best Italia.. This melted the somewhat sulky Corriani to smiles, and his wife to tears. The day elosed with dinner at their beloved Frenel hotel, and a bottle of Burgundy shared with Stefan's favorite waiters.

XI

DURING Christmas week Stefan worked hard at his interior, but about the fifth day began to show signs of restlessuess. The following morning, after only half an hour's painting, he threw down his brush.
"It's no use, Mary," he announeed, "I don't think I shall ever be alle to do this kind of work; it simply doesu't inspire me."

She looked up from her sewing. "Why, I thought it promised ehariningly."
"That's just it." IIe ruffed his hair irritably. "It does. Can you inagine my doing anything 'charming'? No, the only hope for this interior is for me to get depth into it, and depth won't come-it's facile." And he stared disgustedly at the canvas.
"I think I know what you mean," Mary answered absently. She was thinking that his work had power and height, but that depth she had never seen in it.

Stefan shook himself. 'Oh, eome along, Mary, let's get ont of this. We've been mewed up in this domestic atmosphere for days. I shall explode soon. Let's go somewhere."
"Very well," she agreed, folding up her work.
"You feel all right, don't you?" he ehecked himself to ask.
"Rather, don't I look it?"
"You certainly do," he replied, but without his usual praise of her. "I have it, let's take a look at Miss Felicity Berber! I shall probally get some new ideas from her. ILappy thought! Come on, Mary, hat, coat, let's hurry." IIe was all impatience to be gone.

They started to walk up the A veme, stopping at the to find in the telephone book the number of the: berber establislment. It was entered, "Berber, Felic. , Creator of Raiment."
"IIow aftected!" laughed Mary.
"Yes," said Stefan, "ametsing people usually are."
Thongh he appeared moody the - "isp, sumny air of the Avenue gradually brightened him, and Mary, who was beyming to feel her confined mornings, breathed it in joyfully.

The house was in the thirties, a large building of white marble. A lift carried them to the top floor, and left them facing a black door with "Felicity Berwer" painted on it in vermilion letters. Opening this, they fonnd themselves in a huge windowless room roofed with opaque glass. The floor was inlaid in a mosaic of unteven tiles which appeared to be of different shades of black. The walls, from roof to floor, were hung with shiminering green silk of the shade of a parrot's wing. There were no slow-cases or other evidences of commercialism, but about the room were set couches of black japanned wood, upon which rested flat mattresses covered in the same green as the walls. On these silk cushions in black and vernilion were piled. The only other furniture consisted of low tables in black lacquer, one beside every couch. On each of these rested a laequered bowl of Chinese red, obviously for the receipt of cigarette ashes. A similar but larger bowl on a taibe near the door was filled with green orthids. One large greorl silk rug-innorent of pattorn-invited the entering visitor deeper into the room; otirwwise the floor was hare. There were no pietures, 10 decmations, merely this green and black backeromd, relioved hy oceasional splashes of vomilion, and leading up to a great largered sedern of the same hene which obscured a door at the further ent of the roonn.

From the corner nearest the entrance a yomg woman advanced to mect them. She was clarl in flowing limes of upalescent green, and her black hain was banded low across the forehead with a narrow line of emerald.
"You wish to see raiment?" Was her greeting.
Mary felt rather at a loss amidst these ultra-enstheticisms, but Stefan promptly asked to see Miss Berher.
"Madane rarely sees new clients in the morning." The green damsel was pessimistic. Mary felt secretly amused at the ostentations phatseology.
"Tell her we are friends of Mus. Theodore Elliot's," replied Stefan, with lis most brilliant and ingratiating smile.

The damsel brightened smmewhat. "If I may have your name I will see whist can be done," she offered, extending a small vermilion tay. Stefan proluced a card and the damsel floated with it toward the distant exit. Her footsteps were silent on the dead tiling, and there was no sound from the door heyond the sereen.
"Isn't this a lark? Let's sit down," Stefan exelaimed, leading the way to a eonch.
"It's rather absurd, don't you think?" siniled Mary.
"No doubt, bnt amusing enough for mere mortals," he shrugged, a scarcely pereentible $s_{2}$ ub in his tone. Mary was sileni. They walted íor several minutes. At last instinet rather than hearing made them turn to see a figure advaneing down the room.

142 THE NEST-BUILDER

Both instantly recognized the celebrated Miss Berber. A small, slim woman, obviously light-boned and supple, she seemed to move forward like a ripple. Her naturally pale face, with its eurved searlet lips and slanting ryes, was set on a long neek, and round her small head a heavy swathe of black hair was held by huge searlet pins. Her dress, eut in a narrow $V$ at the neek, was all of semitransparent reds, the brilliant happy reds of the Chinese. In fact, but for her head, she would have been only half visible as she advanced against the background of the sereen. Mary's impression of her was blnrred, but Stefan, whose artist's eye observed everything, noticed that her narrow ieet were eneased in heelless satin shees which followed the natural shape of the feet like gloves.
"Mr. and Mrs. Byrd! How do you do?" she murmured, and her voiee was light-breathed, a mere memory of sound. It suggested that slie eustomarily mislaid it, and recaptured only an echo.
"Pull that other eouch a little nearer, please," she waved to Stefan, appropriating the one from which they had just risen. Upon this slie stretehed her full length, propping the eushions comfortably under her shoulders.
"Do you smoke?'" she breathed, and stretehing an arm produced from a hidden drawer in the table at her elbow eigarettes in a box of black laequer, and matehes in one of red. Mary deelined, but Stefan immediately lighted a cigarette for himself and held a mateh for Miss Berber. Mary and he settled themselves on the eouch which he drew up, and which slipped readily over the tiles.
"Now we can talk," exhaled their hostess on a spiral of smoke. "I never see strangers in the morning, not even friends of dear Connie's, but there was something in the name-" She seemed to be fingering a small knob protruding from the lacquer of lier couch. It must have been a bell, for in a moment the green maiden appeared.
"Chloris, las that picture come for the sylvan fitting room?" she murmured. "Yes? Bring it, pleasc." Her gesture seemed to waft the damsel over the floor. During this interlude the Byrds were silent, Stefan hugely entertained, Mary beginning to feel a slight antagonism toward this super-easual dressmaker.

A moment and the attendant nymph reappeared, bearing a large eanvas framed in glistening green wood.
"Against the table-toward Mr. Byrd." Miss Berber supplemented the murmur with an indicative gesture. "You know that?" dropped from her lips as the nymph glided away.

It was Stefan's pastoral of the dancing faun. He nodded gaily, but Mary felt herself blushing. Her husband's work destined for a fitting room!
"I thought so," Miss Berber cnunciated through a breath of smoke. "I picked it up the other day. Quite lovely. My sylvan fitting room required just that note. I use it for country raiment only. Atmosphere, Mr. Byrd. I want my clients to feel young when they are preparing for the country. I am glad to sec you here."
Stefan reeiprocatcd. So far, Miss Berber had ignored Mary.
"I might consult you about my next color schemeoriginal artists are so rare. I ehange this room every year." Her eyelids drooped.

At this point Mary ventured to draw attention to herself.
"Why is it, Miss Berber," she asked in her elear

144 THE NEST-BUILDER

English voice, "that you have only conches here?" Felieity's lids trembled; she half looked up. "How seldom one hears a beantiful voice," she uttered. "Chairs, Mrs. Byrd, destroy women's beauty. Why sit, when one ean reeline? My clients may not wear eorsets; reclining eneourages them to feel at case withont."

Mary found Miss Berber's affectations alsurd, but this explanation heightened her respect for her intelligenee. "Method in her madness," she quoted to herself.
"Miss Berber, I want you to ereate a gown for my wife. I am sure when you look at her yon will be interested in the idea.", Stefan expected every one to pay tribute to Mary's beauty.

Again Miss Berber's fungers strayed. The nymph appeared. "How long have I, Chloris? . . . Half an hour? Then send me Daphne. Yon notice the silenee, Mr. Byrd? It rests my clients, brings health to their nerves. Without it, I eould not do my work."

Mary smiled as she mentally eontrasted these surroundings with Farraday's office, where she had last heard that expression. Was quiet so rare a privilege in Ameriea, she wondered?
$\Lambda$ moment, and a seeond damsel emerged, brownhaired, elad in a paler green, and carrying paper and peneil. Not until this ministrant had seated herself at the foot of Miss Berber's eoneh did that lady refer to Stefan's request. Then, propping herself on her elbow, she at last looked full at Mary. What she saw evidently pleased her, for she allowed herself a slight smile. "Ah," she breathed, "an evening, or a house gown?"
"Evening," interposed Stefan. Then to Mary, "You look your best décolletée, you know."
"Englishwomen always do," murmured Miss Berber.
"Will you kindly take off your hat and coat, and stand up, Mrs. Byrd?" Mary complied, feeling uncomfortably like a cloak model.
"Classie, pure elassie. How seldom one sees it!" Miss Berber's voice beeame quite audible. "Gold, of course, elassie lines, gold sandals. A fillet, but no ornaments. You wish to wear this raiment during the ensuing months, Mrs. Byrd?" Mary nodded. "Then write Demeter type," the designer interpolated to her satellite, who was taking notes. "Otherwise it would of course be Artemis-or Aphrodite even?" turning for agreement to Stefan. "Would you say Aphrodite?"
"I always do," beamed he, delighted.
At this point the first nymph, Chloris, again appeared, and at a motion of Miss Berber's hand rapidly and silently measured Mary, the paler hued nymph assisting her as seribe.
"Mr. Byrd," pronounced the autocrat of the establishment, when at the conclusion of these rites the attendants had faded from the room. "I never design for less than two hundred dollars. Sueh a garment as I have in mind for your wife, queenly and abmudant-" her hands waved in illustration-"wonld cost three hundred. But-" her look eleeked Mary in an exelamation of re-fusal-" we belong to the same world, the world of art, not of finance. Yes?", She smiled. "Your painting, Mr. Byrd, is worth three times what I gave for it, and Mrs. Byrd will wear my raiment as few clients can. It will give me pleasure"-her lids dronped to illustrate finality-" to make this garment for the value of the material, whieh will be-'" her lips smiled ammsement at the bagatelle-" "between seventy and eighty-five dollars-no more." She ceased.

146

 THE NEST-BUILDERMary felt uncomfortable. Why should she accept such a favor at the hands of this poscuse? Stefan, however, saved her the necessity of decision. He leapt to his feet, all smiles.
"Niss Berber," he cried, "you honor us, and Mary will glorify your design. It is probable," he beamed, "that we cannot afford a dress at all, but I disregard that utterly." He shrugged, and snapped a finger. "You have given me an inspiration. As soon as the dress arrives, I shall paint Mary as Demeter. Nille rewerciements!" Bending, he kissed Miss Berber's hand in the continental manner. Mary, watehing, felt a tiny prick of jealousy. "He never kissed my hand," she thought, and instantly scorned herself for the idea.
The designer smiled languidly up at Stefan. "I am happy," she murmured. "No fittings, Mrs. Byrd. We rarely fit, except the model gowns. You will have the garment in a week. Au revoir." Her eyes closed. They turned to find a high-busted woman entering the room, accompanied by two young girls. As they departed a breath-like echo floated after them. "Oh, really, Mrs. Van Sittart - still those corsets? I can do nothing for you, you know." Tones of shrill excuse penetrated to the lift door. At the curb below stood a dyspeptically stuffed limousine, guarded by two men in puce liveries.
The Byrds swung southward in silence, but suddenly Stefan heaved a great breath. "Nom d'un nom d'un nom d'un vicux bonhomme!' he cxploded, voicing in that cumulative expletive his extreme satisfaction with the morning.

XII

CONSTANCE ELLIOT had not boasted her stagemanagement in vain. On the first Saturday in January all proceeded according to schedule. The Danaë, beautifully framed, stood at the farther end of Constance's double drawing-room, from which all other mural impedimenta, together with most of the furniture, had been removed. Expertly lighted, the picture glowed in the otherwise obscure room like a thing of flame.

Two hundred ticket holders came, saw, and were conquered. Farraday, in his most correct cutaway, personally conducted a tour of three eminent critics to the Village. Sir Micah, the English curator of the Metropolitan, reflectively tapping an eye-glass upon an uplifted finger tip, pronounced the painting a turningpoint in American art. Four reporters-whose presence in his immediate vicinity Constance had insured-transferred this utterance to their note books. Artists gazed, and well-dressed women did not orbear to gush. Tea, punch, and yellow suffrage cake. were consumed in the dining room. There was much noise and excessive heat. In short, the occasion was a success.

Toward the end, when few people remained except the genial Sir Micah, whom Constance was judiciously holding with tea, smiles, and a good cigar, the all-important Constantine arrived. Prompted, Sir Micah was induced to repeat his verdict. But the picture spoke for itself, and the famous dealer was visibly impressed. Constance was able to cat her dinner at last with a comfortable sense of aceomplishment. She was only sorry that the Byrds had not been there to appreciate her strategy. Stefan, inded, did appear for half an homr, hat Mary's courage had failed her entirely. She had suecmmed to an attack of stage fright and shut herself up at home.

148 THE NEST-BUILDER

As for Stefan, he had developed one of his nost contrary moods. Refusing conventional attire, he clad himself in the baggy trousers and flowing tie of his student days, under the illusion that he was thus defying the prejudices of Philistia. He was maware that the Philistines, as represented by the gentlemen of the press, considered his costme quintessentially correct for an artist just returned from Paris, and would have been grieved had he appeared otherwise. Unconseionsly play. ing to the gallery, Stefan on arrival squared himself against a doorway and eyed the crowds with a frown of disapprobation. IIe had not forgotten his early snubs from the dealers, and saw in every innocent male visitor one of the fraternity.

Constance, in her bid for publicity, had sold most of her tickets to the socially prominent, so that Stefan was soon surrounded by voluble ladies unduly furred, corseted, and jeweled. IIc found these unbeautiful, and his misanthropy, which had been quiescent of late, rose rampant.

Presently he was introduced to a stout matron, whose costume centered in an enormous costal cascade of gray pearls.
"Mr. Byrd," she gushed, "I dote on art. I've made a study of it, and I can say that your picture is a triumph."

[^0]to enter the kingdom of Art as for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle." Leaving her pink with offense, he turned his back and, shaking off other wouldbe admirers, sought his hostess.
"My God, I can't stand any more of this-I'm off," he confided to her. Constance was beginning to know her man. She gave him a (puick scrutiny. "Yes, I think you'd better be," she agreed, "before you spoil any of my good work. An absent lion is better than a snarling one. Run home to Mary." She dismissed him laughingly, and Stefain catapulted hinself out of the house, thereby missing the attractive Miss Berber by a few minutes. Dashing home across the Square, he flung himself on the divan with every appearance of exhanstion. "Sing to me, Mary," he implured.
"Why, Stefan," she asked, startled, "wasn't it a suecess? What's the matter?"
"Success!" he senffed. "Oh, yes. They all gushed and gurgled and squeaked and squalled. Itorible! Sing, dearest; I inust hear something beautiful."

Failing to extract more from hiin, she complied.
The next day brought a full account of his snecess from Constance, and glowing tributes from the papers. The head-lines ranged from "Suffragettes Unearth New Genins" to "Distinguished Exhibit at Home of Theodore M. Ellint." The verdict was unanimous. A new star had risen in the artistic firmament. One look at the headings, and Stefan dropped the papers in disgust. but Mary pored over them all, and found him quite willing to listen while she read enlogistic extracts aloud.

Thus started, the fuse of publicity burnt brightly. Constance's carefully plamed follow-up artieles appeared, and reporters besieged the Byrds' studio. Unfortunately for Mary, these gentry soon discovered that she was the Danaë's original, which fact created a mild suecès de scandale. Personal paragraphs appeared about her and her writing, and, greatly embarrassed, she disconnected the door-bell for over a week. But the picture was all the more talked about. In a week Constantine had it on exhibition; in three, he had sold it for five thousand dollars to a tobaceo millionaire.

150 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Mary," groaned Stefan when he heard the news, "we have given in to Mammon. We are eapitalists."
"Oh, dear, think of our beautiful picture going to some odions nouveau riche!" Mary sighed. But she was immeasurably relieved that Stefan's name was made, and that they were permanently lifted from the ranks of the needy.

That very day, as if to illustrate their change of status, Mrs. Corriani puffed up the stairs with the news that the flat immediately below them had been abandoned over night. The tenants, a dark eouple of questionable habits and nationality, had omitted the formality of paying their rent-the flat was on the market. The outcome was that Stefan and Mary, keeping their studio as a workshop, overflowed into the flat beneath, and found themselves in possession of a bed and bathroom, a kitelen and maid's room, and a sitting room. These they determiner! to furnish gradually, and Mary looked forward to blisstul mornings at antique stores and anctions. She had been brought up amidst the Chippendale, old oak, and brasses of a eathed! : lose, and new furniture was anathema to her. A tele ${ }_{1}$, one and a colored maid-servant were installed. Their pienicking days were over.

XIII

TRUE to her word, Constance arranged a reeeption in the Byrds' honor, at whieh they were to meet Felieity Berber. The promise of this eneounter reconeiled Stefan to the affair, and he was moreover enthusiastieally looking forward to Mary's appearance in her new gown. This had arrived, and lay swathed in tissue paper in its box.

In view of their elange of fortune they had, in paying the aecount of seventy-five dollars, eoneocted a little note to Miss Berber, hoping she would now reeonsider her offer, and render them a bill for her design. This note, written and signed by Mary in her upright English hand, brought forth a characteristic reply. On black paper and in vermilion ink arrived two lines of what Mary at first took to be Egyptian hieroglyphies. Studied from different angles, these yielded at last a single sentence: "A gift is a gift, and repays itself." This was followed by a signature traveling perpendicularly down the page in Chinese fashion. It was outlined in an oblong of red ink, but was itself written in green, the capitals being supplied with tap-roots extending to the base of each name. Mary tossed the letter over to Stefan with a smile. He looked at it judicially.
"There's dranghtsmanship in that," he said; "she might have made an etcher. It's drawing, but it's certainly not handwriting."

On the evening of the party Stefan insisted on helping Mary to dress. Together they opened the great green 151

152 THE NEST-BUILDER

box and spread its eontents on the bed. The Creator of Raiment had not done things by halves. In addition to the gown, she had supplied a wreath of pale white and goid metals, representing two ears of wheat arranged to meet in a point over the brow, and a pair of gilded shoes made on the sandal plan, with silver-white buckles. limed to the gown was a printed green slip, reading "No corsets, petticoats or jewelry may be worn with this garb."

The dress was of heavy gold tissue, magnifieently draped in generous classic folds. It left the arms bare, the drapery being fastened on either shoulder with great brooches of white metal, reproduced, as Stcfan at onee recognized, from Greck models. Along all the edges of the drapery ran a border of ears of wheat, embroidered in deep gold and pale silver. Mary, who had hitherto only peeped at the gown, felt quite excited when she saw it flung across the bed.
"Oh, Stefan, I do think it will be becoming," she cried, her eheeks bright pink. She had never dreamed of owning sueh a dress.

He was enelianted. "It's a work of art. Very few women could wear it, but on you-! Well, it's worthy of you, Beautiful."

During the dressing he made her quite nervous by lis exact attention to every detail. The arrangement of her hair and the precise position of the wreath had to be tried and tried again, but the result justified him.
"Olympian Deity," he eried, "I must kneel to you!" And so he did, gaily adoring, with a kiss for the hem of her robe. They started in the highest spirits, Stefan eorreet this time in an immaenlate evening suit which Mary had persuaded him to order. As they prepared to enter the drawing room he whispered, "You'll be a sensation. I'm dying to see their faces."
"Don't make ine nerwous," she whispered baek.
By nature entirely without self-conscionsness, she had become very sensitive since the Danaë publicity. But her nervousness only heightened her color, and as with her beantiful walk she advanced into the room there was an audible gasp from every side. Constance pounced upon her.
"You perfectly superb ereature! You ought to have clouds rolling under your feet. There, I can't express myself. Come and receive homage. Mr. Byrd, you're the luckiest man on earth-I hope you descrve it allbut then of course no man could. Mary, here are two friends of yours-Mr. Byrd, come and be presented to Felicity."

F'arraday and McEwan had advaneed toward them and immediately formed the mucleus of a gronp which gathered about Mary. Stefan followed his hostess across the room to a green sofa, on which, cigarette in hand, reelined Miss Berber, surrounded by a knot of interested admirers.
"Yes, Connie," that lady murmured, with the ghost of a smile, "I've met Mr. Byrd. He brought his wife to the Studio." She extended a languid hand to Stefan, who bowed over it.
"Ah! I might have known you had a hand in that effect," Constance exclai . 1, looking across the room toward Mary.
"Of course you might," the other sighed, following her friend's eyes. "It's perfect, I think; don't you agree, Mr. Byrd?" and she actually rose from the sofa to obtain a better view.

154 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Absolutely," answered Stefan, riveted in his turn upon her.

Miss Berber was elad in black tulle, so transparent as barely to obseure her form. Sleeves she had none. A trifle of gauze traveled over one shoulder, leaving the other bare save for a supporting strap of tiny searlet beads. IIer triple skirt was serrated like the petals of a black carnation, and outlined with the same minute heads. Her bodice eould scareely be said to exist, so deep was its V. From her ears long ornaments of jet depended, and a comb in searlet bead-work ran wholly across one side of her head. A flower of the same hue and workmanship trembled from the point of her corsage. She wore no rings, but her nails were reddened, and her sleek black hair and searlet lips completed the elromatic harmony. The whole effect was seductive, but so erisp as to escape vulgarity.
"I must paint you, Miss Berwer," was Stefan's comment.
"All the artists say that." She waved a faint expostulation.

Her hands, he thought, had the whiteness and consistency of a camelia.
"All the artists are not I, however," he answered with a smiling shrug.
"Greek meets Greek," thought Constance, amused, turning away to other guests.
"I admit that." Miss Berber lit another cigarette. "I have seen your Danaë. The people who have painted me have been fools. Obvious-treating me like an advertisement for cold eream."

She breathed a sigh, and sank again to the sofa. Her lids drooped as if in weariness of such banalities. Ste-fan sat beside her, the manner of both eliminating the surrounding group.

MATED

"One must have subtlety, must one not?" slie murmured.

How subtle she was, he thought; how mysterious, in spite of her obvious posing! He could not even tell whetl er she was interested in him.
"I shall paint you, Miss Berber," he said, watehing her, "as a Nixic. Water creatures, you know, without souls."
"No soul ?" she reflected, lingering on a puff of smoke. "How chac:"
stems was delighted. Hopefully, he broke into Frena: sin $^{\text {an }}$ replicd with fluent ease, but with a stran!e, thongh charming, acent. The exotic French fitted her whole personality, he felt, as Tnerlish could not do. He was pricked by curiosity as in ier origin, and did not hesitate to ask it, but sha smile, and waved her eigarette va , $11^{2 \%} . \quad$ "itién sabe?" she shrugged.
"Do you know Spanish ?" he :...... : Seeking a clue.
"Only what one pieks up in Caiiton", !f: nas no nearer a solution.
"Were you out there long?"
She looked at him vaguely. "I should like some coffee, please."

Defeated, he was obliged to fetch a cup. When he returned, it was to find her talking monosyllabic English to a group of men.

Farraday and MeEwan had temporarily resigned Mary to a stream of neweomers, and stood watching the seene from the inner drawing room.

156 THE NEST-BUILDER

"James," said McEwan, "get on to the makenp of the crowd round our lady, and compare it with the specimens rubbering the little Berber.'

Farraday smiled in his grave, slow way.
"You're right, Mac, the substance and the shadow."
Many of the women seated about the room were covertly staring at Felicity, but so far none had joined her group. This consisted, besides Stefan, of two callow and obviously enthralled youths, a heavy semi-bald man with paunched eyes and a gluttonous mouth, and a tall languid person wearing tufts of hair on unexpected parts of his face, and showing the hands of a musician.

Round Mary stood half a dozen women, their host, the kindly and practical Mr. Elliot, a white-haired man of distinguished bearing, and a gigantic young viking with tawny hair and beard and powerful hands.
"'That's Guntler, an A1 sculptor," said McEwan, indicating the viking, who was looking at Mary as his ancesto night have looked at a vision of Freia.
"'lisy're well matched, eh, James?"
"As well as she could be," the other answered gravely. McEwan looked at his friend. "Mon," he said, relapsing to his native speech, "come and hae a drop o' the guid Scotch."

Constance had determined that Felicity should dance, in spite of her well-known laziness. At this point she erossed the room to attack her, expecting a diificult task, but, to her surprise, Felicity hardly demurred. After a moment of sphinx-like communing, she dropped her cigarette and rose.
"Mr. Byrd is going to paint me as something without a soul-I think I will dance," she cryptically vouchsafed.
"Shall I play?" offered Constanee, delighted.
Miss Berber turned to the languid musician.
"Have you your oearina, Marehmont?" she breathed.
"I always carry it, Felicity," he replied, with a reproachful look, drawing from his pocket what appeared to be a somewhat eontorted meerseliaum pipe.
"Then no piano to-night, Connie. A little banal, the piano, perhaps." Her hands waved vaguely.

A space was eleared; chairs were arranged.
Miss Berber vanished behind a portière. The languid Marehmont draped himself in a corner, and put the fat little meersehaum to his lips. A elear, joeund sound, a nere thread of musie, as from the pipe of some hidden faun, penetrated the room. The notes trembled, pansed, and fell to the minor. Felieity, feet bare, toes touched with searlet, wafted into the room. IIer dancing was ineredibly light; she louked like some exotie poppy sway. ing to an imperecptible breeze. The dance was languorously sad, palely gay, a thing half asleep, veiled. It seemed always about to break into fieree life, yet did not. The seent of mandragora hung over it-it was as if the daneer, drugged, were dreaming of the sunlight.

When, waving a negligent land to the applause, Felicity passed Siefan at the end of her danee, he cauglit a murmured phrase from her.
"Not soulless, perhaps, but sleeping." Whether she meant this as an explanation of her dance or of herself he was not sure.

Mary watehed the dance with admiration, and wished to compare leer impressions of it with her husband's. She tried to eatel his eye across the room at the end, but he had drifted away toward the dining room. Momentarily disappointed, she turned to find Farraday at her elbow, and gladly let him lead her, also, in search of refreshments. There was a general movement in that direction, and the drawing room was almost empty as MeEwan, purpose in his cye, strode across it to Constance. He spoke to her in an undertone.

158

THE NEST-BUILDER

"Sing? Does she? I had no idea! She never tells one sueh things," his hostess replied. "Do you think she would? But she has no music. You eould play for her? How splendid, Mr. MeEwan. How perfeetly lovely of you. I'll arrange it." She hurried out, leaving MeEwan smiling at nothing in visible contentment. In a few minutes she returned with Mary.
"Of course I will if you wish it," the latter was saying, "but I've no musie, and only know foolish little ballads."
"Mr. MeEwan says he can vamp them all, and it will be too delightful to have something from eaeh of my women stars," Constance urged. "Now I'll leave you two to arrange it, and in a few minutes I'll get every one baek from the dining room," she nodded, slipping away again.
"Cruel man, you've given me away," Mary smiled.
"I always brag about my friends," grinned MeEwan. They went over to the piano.
"What price the Bard! Do you know this?" His fingers ran into the old air for "Sigh No More, Ladies." She nodded.
"Yes, I like that."
"And for a seeond," he spun round on his stool, "what do you say to a duct?" His candid blue eyes twinkled at her.
"A duet!" she exclaimed in genuine surprise. "Do you sing, Mr. McEwan?"'
"Onee in a while," and, soft pedal down, he played a few bars of Marzials' "My True Love Hatli My Heart," humming the words in an easy barytone.
"Oh, what fun!" exclaimed Mary. "I love that." They tried it over, below their breaths.

The room was filling again. People began to settle down expectantly; McEwan struck his opening chords.

Just as Mary's first note sounded, Stefan and Felieity entered the room. He started in surprise; then Mary saw him smile delightedly, and they both settled themselves well in front.
" 'Men were deceivers ever,' "' sang Mary, with simple ease, and " 'Hey nonny, nonny.'" The notes fell gaily; her lips and eyes smiled.

There was gencrous applause at the end of the little song. Then McEwan struck the first elhords of the duct.
"' My true love hath my heart," " Mary sang clearly, head up, cyes shining. "'My true love hath my heart," " replied McEwan, in his eheery barytonc.
"' - And I have his,'" Mary's bell tones announced.
"' -And I have his," " trolled McEwan.
"' There never was a better bargain driven,'" the notes eame, confident and glad, from the golden figure with its clear-eyed, glowing face. They ended in a burst of almost defiant optimism.

Applause was hearty and prolonged. MeEwan slipped from his stool and sought a cigarette in the adjoining room. There was a gencral congratulatory movement toward Mary, in which both Stefan and Fe lieity joined. Then people again began to break into groups. Felicity found her sofa, Mary a ehair. McEwan discovered Farraday under the arch between the two drawing-rooms, and stood beside him to watch the crowd. Stefan had moved with Felieity toward her sofa, and, as she disposed herself, she seemed to be talking to him in French. MeEwan and Farraday continued their survey. Mary was surrounded by people, but her eyes strayed aeross the room. Felicity appeared almost animated, but Stefan seemed inattentive; he fidgeted, and looked vague.

160 THE NEST-BUILDER

A moment more, and quite abruptly he erossed the room, and planted himself down beside Mary.
"Ah," sighed McEwan, apparently à propos of nothing, and with a trace of Scotch, "James, I'll now hae another whusky."

PART III

THE NESTLING

STEFAN'S initial and astonishing success was not to be repeated that winter. The great Constantine, anxious to benefit by the Hood tide of his client's popularity, had indeed called at the studio in search of more material, but after a careful survey, had decided against exhibiting "Tempest" and "P'ursuit." Before these pictures he had stood wrapped in speculation for some time, pursing his lips and fingering the over-heavy seals of his fob. Mary had watched him eagerly, deeply curious as to the effect of the paintings. But Stefan had been careless to the point of rudeness; he had long since lost interest in his old work. When at last the swarthy little dealer, who was a Greek Jew, and had the keen perceptions of both races, had shaken his head, Mary was not surprised, was indeed almost glad.
"Mr. Byrd," Constantine had pronounced, in his heavy, imperfect English, "I think we would make a bad mistake to exhibit these paintings now. Technically they are clever, oh, very elever indeed, but they would be unpopular; and this once," he smiled shrewdly, "the public would be right about it. Your Danaë was a big conception as well as fine painting; it had inspiration-feeling-"' his thick but supple hands circled in emphasis -"we don't want to go. back simply to eleverness. When you paint me something as big again as that one I exhibit it ; otherwise," with a shrug, "I think we spoil our market."

164 THE NEST-BUILDER

After this visit Stefan, quite unperturbed, had turned the two fantasies to the wall.
"I dare say Constantine is right about them," he said; "they are rather erazy things, and anyhow, I'm sick of them."

Mary was quite relieved to have them hidden. The merman in particular had got upon her nerves of late.

As the winter advaneed, the Byrds' eirele of aequaintances grew, and many visitors dropped into the stidio for tea. These showed mueh interest in Stefan's new pieture, a large study of Mary in the guise of Demeter, for which she was posing seated, robed in her Berber gown. Miss Mason in particular was delighted with the painting, which she dubbed a "companion piece" to the Danaë. The story of Constantine's decision against the two salon eanvases got about and, amusingly enough, heightened the Byrds' popularity. The Anglo-Saxon public is loth to take its art neat, preferring it eoated with a little sentiment. It now beeame aceepted that Stefan's genius was due to his wife, whose love had lighted the toreh of inepiration.
"Ah, Mr. Byrd," Miss Mason had summed up the popular view, in one of her rare romantic moments, "the love of a good woman-!" Stefan had looked completely vague at this remark, and Mary had burst out laughing.
"Why, Sparrow," for so, to Miss Mason's delight, she had named lier, "don't be Tennysonian, as Stefan would say. It was Stefan's power to feel love, and not mine to call it out, that painted the Danaë,' and she looked at him with proud tenderness.

But the Sparrow was unconvinced. "You can't tell me. If 'twas all in him, why didn't some other girl over in Paris call it out long ago?"
"Lots tried," grinned Stcfan, with his cheeky-boy expression.
"Ain't he terrible," Miss Mason sighed, smiling. She adored Mary's husband, but consistently disapproved of him.

Try as she would, Mary failed to shake her friends' estimate of her share in the family suceess. It became the fashion to regard her as a muse, and she, who had felt oppressed by Stefan's lover-like deification, now found her friends, too, conspiring to place her on a pedestal. Essentially simple and modest, she suffered real discomfort from the cult of adoration that surrounded her. Coming from a British comınmity which she felt had underestimated her, she now found herself made too much of. A smaller woman would have grown vain amid so much admiration; Mary only became inwardly more humble, while ontwardly carrying her honors with laughing deprecation.

For some time after the night of Constance's reeeption, Stefan had shown every cvidene of contentment, but as the winter draqged into a cold and slab: Nowh he began to have recurrent moods of his antwe irritibility. By this time Mary was moving heaviy: she could no longer keep brisk pace with him in his tramps up the Avenue, but walked more slowly and for shomotom distances. She no ionger sprang swiftly from her chair or ran to fetch him a needed tool; her every movement was matronly. But she was so well, so entirely normal, as practically to be uneonscious of a change to whieh her husband was increasingly alive.

166

 THE NEST-BUILDFRAnother source of Stefan's dissatisfaction lay in the progress of his Demeter. This picture showed the Goddess enthroned under the shade of a tree, beyond which spread harvest fields in brilliant sunlight. At her feet a naked boy, brown from the sun, played with a pile of red and golden fruits. In the distance maids and youths were dancing. The Goddess sat back drowsily, her eyelids drooping, her hands and arms relaxed over her chair. She had called all this rielmess into being, and now in the heat of the day she rested, brooding over the fecund earth. So far, the composition was masterly, but the tones lacked the neeessary depth; they were vivid where they should have been warin, and he felt the deficiency without yet having been able to remedy it.
"Oh, damn!" said Stefan one morning, throwing down his brush. "This pieture is arehitectural, absolutely. What possessed me to try such a coneeption? I can only do movement. I can't be static. Earth! I don't understand it-everything good I've done has been made of air and fire, or water." He turned an irritable face to Mary.
"Why did you encourage me in this?"
She looked up in frank astonishment, about to reply, but he forestalled her.
"Oh, yes, I know I was pleased with the idea-it isn't your fault, of course, and yet- Oh, what's the use!" IIe slapped down his pallette and made for the door. "I'm off to get some air," he called.

Mary felt hurt and uneasy. The nameless doubts of the autumn again assailed her. What would be the cud, she wondered, of her great adventure? The distant prospect vaguely troubled her, but she turned easily from it to the immediate future, whieh held a blaze of joy suffieient to obliterate all else.

THE NESTLING

The thought of her baby was to Mary like the opening of the gates of paradise to Christian the Pilgrim. Her heart shook with joy of it. She passed through her days now only half conseions of the world about her. She had, together with her joy, an extraordinary sense of physical well-being, of the aetual value of the body. For the first time she became aetively interested in her beauty. Even on her honeynoon she had never diessed to please her husband with the care she now gave to the donning of her loose pink and white negligées and the little boudoir eaps she had bought to wear with them. That Stefan paid her fewer eompliments, that he often failed to notice sinall additions to her wardrobe, affeeted her not at all. "Afterwards he will be pleased; afterwards he will love me more than ever," she thought, but, even so, knew that it was not for him she was now fair, but for that other. She did not love Stefan le:s, but her love was to be made flesh, and it was that incarnation she now adored. If she had been given to self-analysis she might have asked what it boded that she had neversave for that one moment's adoration of his genius the day he completed the Danaë-felt for Stefim the abandonment of love she felt for his coming child. She might have wondered, but she did not, for she felt too intensely in these days to have mueh need of thought. She loved her husband-he was a great man-they were to have a ehild. The sense of those three faets made up her cosmos.

Farraday had asked her in vain on more than one neeasion for another manuseript. The last time she shook

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)

168

TIIE NEST-BUILDER

her head, with one of her rare attempts at explanation, made less rarely to him than to her other friends.
"No, Mr. Farraday, I can't think about imaginary ehildren just now. There's a spell over me-all the world waits, and I'm holding my breath. Do you see?"

He took her hand between both his.
"Yes, my dear ehild, I do," he answered, his mouth twisting into its sad and gentle smile. He liad come bringing a sheaf of spring flowers, nareissus, and golden daffodils, which she was lolding in her lap. He thought as he said good-bye that she looked much more like Persephone than the Demeter of Stefan's picture.

In spite of her deep-seated emotion, Mary was gay and practical enough in these late winter days, with her small household tasks, her oecasional shopping, and her sewing. This last had begun vaguely to irritate Stefan, so ineessant was it.
"Mary, do put down that sewing," he would exclaim; or "Don't sing the song of the shirt any more to-day;" and she would langhingly fold her work, only to take it up instinctively again a few minutes later.

Onc evening he eame upon her bending over a table in their sitting room, traeing a fine design on eambric with a pencil. Something in her pose and figure opened a forgotten door of memory; be watched her puzzled for a moment, then with a sudden exclamation ran upstairs, and returned with a pad of paper and a box of water-color paints. IIe was visibly excited. "Here, Mary,' he said, thrusting a brush into her hand and elearing a place on the table. "Do something for me. Make a drawing on this pad, anything you like, whatever first eomes into your head." His tone was eagerly importunate. She looked up in surprise.
"Why, you fumy boy! What shall I draw?"
"That's just it-I don't know. Please draw whatever you want to-it doesn't matter how badly-just draw something."

Mystified, but aequieseent, Mary eonsidered for a moment, looking from paper to brush, while Stefan watched eagerly.
"Can't I use a peneil?" she asked.
"No, a brush, please, I'll explain afterwards."
"Very well." She attacked the b:own paint, then the red, then mixed some green. In a few minutes the paper showed a wobbly little honse with a red roof and a smudged foregromind of green grass with the sugrestion of a shade-giving tree.
"There," she langhed, handing him the pad, "I'm afraid I shall never be an artist," and she looked up.

IIis face had dropped. He was staring at the drawing with an expression of almost comic disappointment.
"Why, Stefan," she langhed, rather memeonfably, "you didn't think I could draw, did you?",
"No, no, it isn't that, Mary. It's just-the house. I thonght yon might-perhaps draw birds-or flowers."
"Birds?-or flowers?" She was at a loss.
"It doesn't matter; just an idea."
He erumpled up the little house, and elosed the paintbox. "I'm going out for awhile; good-bye, dearest;" and, with a kiss, he left the room.

Mary sat still, too surprised for remonstrance, and in a moment heard the bang of the flat door.
"Birds, or flowers?" Snddenly she remembered something Stefan hat told her, on the night of their engagement, about his mother. So that was it. Tears eame to her eyes. Rather lonely, she went to bed.

170 THE NEST-BUILDER

Meanwhile Stefan, his head bare in the cold wind, was speeding up the Avenue on the top of an omnibns.
"Houses are cages," he said to himself. For some reason, he felt hideously depressed.
"I ealled on Miss Berber last evening," Stefan announeed easually at breakfast the next morning.
"Did you?" replied Mary, surprised, putting down her eup. "Well, did you have a nice time?"
"It was mildly amusing," he said, opening the newspaper. The subject dropped.

II

MARY, who had lived all her life in a small town within sight of the open fields, was beginning to feel the continement of city life. Even during her year in London she hed joined other girls in weekend bieyeling excursions cut of town, or tubed .o Golder's Green or Sheplierd's Bush in seareh of country walks. Now that the late snows of Mareh had cleared away, she began eagerly to watel for swelling buds in the Square, and was dismayed when Stefan told her that the spring, in this part of Ameriea, was barely perceptible before May.
"That's the first objection I've found to your comntry, Stefan," she said.

IIe was scowling moodily out of the window. "The first? I see nothing but objections."
"Oh, come!" she smiled at him; "it hasu't been so bad, has it?"
"Better than I had expected," he eoneeded. "But it will soon be April, and I remember the leaves in the Lusembourg for so many Aprils baek."

She eame and put her arm through his. "Do you want to go, dear?"
"Oh, hang it all, Mary, you don't suppose I want to leave you?" he answered bruscuely, releasing his arm. "I want my own place, that's all."

She had, in her quieter way, become just as homesick 171

172

TIIE NEST-BUILDER

for England, though sharing none of his distike of her adopted lind.
"Well, shall we both go?" she suggested.
He laughed shortly. "Dou't be absurt, dearestwhat would your doctor say to such a notion? No, we 've got to stick it out," and he ruffed his hair impationtly.

With a suppressed sigh Mary changed the subjert. "By the by, I want you to mert Dr. Hillyard; I have askei her to tea this afternoon."
"Do you honestly mean it when you say she is net an elderly ironsides with spectaeles?"
"I honestly assure you she is young and pretty. Moreover, I forbid you to talk like an anti-suffragist," she laughed.
"Very well, then, I will be at home," with an answering grin.

And so he was, and on his best behavior, when the little doctor arrived an hour later. She had been found by the omniseient Miss Mason, and after several visits Mary had more than endorsed the Sparrow's enthusiastie praise.

When the slight, well-tailored little figure entered the room Stefan found it hard to believe that this freshfaced $\mathfrak{\varepsilon}$ :rl was the physieiau, ahready a specialist in her line, to whom Mary's fate had been entrusted. For the first time he wondered if he should not have shared with Mary some responsibility for her arra gements. But as, with an uuwonted sense of duty, he questioned the little doctor, his doubts vanished. Without a trace of the mueh hated professional manmer she gave him glimpses of wide experience, and at one point mentioned an operation she had just performed-whieh he knew by hearsay as one of grave diflienty-with the same enthusiastie pleasure another young woman might have shown in the deseription of a successful bargain-hant. She was to Stefan a new type, and he was delishted with her. Mary, watehing him, thonght with affectionate irong that hati the little surgeon bean reported plain of face he would hase denied himself in advance both the duty and the pleasure of meeting her.

Over their tea, Dr. Hillyard made a suggention.
"Where are you planning to spend the summer?" she asked.

Stefan looked surprised. "We thought we ought to be here, near yon,'' he answered.
"Oh, no," the doctor shook her head; "Young (ountes are always martyrizing themselves for these events. By May it will be warm, and Mrs. Byrd isn't acclimatized to our Ameriean summers. Find a niee place not too far from the eity-say on Long Iskind-and I ean run out whenever necessary. You both like the country, I imagine?"

Stefan was overjoyed. He jumped up.
"Dr. Hillyard, you've saved us. We thought we had to be prisoners, and I're been eating my heart out for Franee. The ecuntry will be a compronise."
"Yes," said the doctor, smiling a little, "Mrs. Byrd has been longiag for Eugland for a mouth or more."
"I never said so!" and "She never told me!" ex. elaimed Mary and Stefan simultaneonsly.
"No, you didn 't," the little doetor nodded wisely at her patient, "but I know."

Stefan inmediately began to plan an expedition in search of the ideal spot, as unspoiled if possible as Shade-han, but much nearer town. All through dimer he discussed it, his spirits lugely improved, and immediately after rang up Constance Elliot for advice.

174 THE NEST-BUILDER

"IDolel the line," the lady's voice rephed, "while I consult." In a minute or two she retmoned.
"Mr. F'arraday is dining with us, and I've asked him. He lives at Crab's Bay, you know."
" ${ }^{\circ} \mathrm{o}$, I don ${ }^{`}$,'’ objected Stefan.
"Well, he does," her voice laughed back. 'He was born there. He says if you like he will eome over and talk to you about it, and I, like a self-sacrifieing hostess, ann willing to let him."
"Splendid idea," said Stefan, "ask him to eome right over. Mary," he called, hanging up the receiver, "Constance is sending Farraday across to advise us."
"Oh, dear," said she; "sometimes I feel ahmost overwhelmed by all the favors we receive from our friends."
"Fiddlesticks! They are paid by the pleasure of our society. You don't seem to realize that we are umusually interesting and attractive people,' laughed he with a flourish.
"Vain boy!"
"So I am, and vain of being vain. I believe in being as conceited as possible, conceited enough to make one's conceit good."

She smiled indulgently, knowing that, as he was talking nonsense, he felt happy.

Farraday appeared in a few minutes, and they settled in a group round the fire with coffee and cigarettes. Stefan offered Mary one. She shook her head.
"I'm not sinoking now, you know."
"Did Dr. Hillyard say so?" he asked quiekly.
"No, but-"
"Then don't be poky, rearest." In. lit the cigarette and hell it out to her, but she waved it hack.
"Don't tease, dear," she murmured, notioing that Farraday was watching them. Stefan with a shrog retained the cigarette in his left hemd, and smoker it ostentatiously for some mimes, altermately with his own. Mary, hoping he was not going to be nanghty, embarked on the Long Island topie.
"We want to be within an hour of the city.," she explained, "but in pretty comntry. We want to keep house, but not to pay too mueh. We should like to be near the sea. Does that somed wildly impossible?"

Farraday fingered his cigarette reflectively.
"I rather think," he said at last, "that my neighborhood most ne. : meets the rermirements. I hawe several hundred aeres at Ciab)s Bay, which belouged to my father, ruming from the shore halfway to the rai road station. The village itself is growing sububan, but che properties beyond mine are all large and keep the com. try open. We are only an hour fr : the eity-hardly more, by automobile."
"Are there many tin eans?" enquired Stefan, flippantly. "In Michigan I remember them as the chief suburban decoration."
"Yes?", said Farraday, in his invariably courteous tone, "I've never been there. It is a long way from New York."
"Touehé," eried Stefan, griming. "But yon would think pessimism jus'sied if you'd ever had my experitiree of rural life."
"Was your father really American?" enquired his guest with apparent irrelevance.
"Yes, and a minister."

176 THE NES'C-13UILDER

"Oh, a minister. ' swe," the other replied, quietly.
" Explains it, does it?" heamed stefan, who was nothing if not quirk. They all laturned, and the little due" was emed. Mary took up the broken disenssion.
"Is thare the slightest "hmere of ome finding anything

"I was just eoming to that," said Farmalay. "Yon wond not eare to be in the vilage, and any homses that might be for rent there wond he expensive, ['us afraid. I'at it so happens there is a cottage on the edge of my property where my father's old farmer used to live. After his thenth I put a little furniture in th. place, and have oceasionally used it. But it is entirely manees. sary to me, and you are weleome to it fow the summer if it would suit you. The rent would be uminall. I don't regard it commercially, it's too near my own place."

Mary flnshed. "It"s most awfully good of you," she said, "but $I$ don't know if we ourht to aceept. I'm afraid you may be making it convenient out of kinctness."
"Mary, how British!" Stefan iutermpted. Ite had taken lately so to labeling her small conventionalities. "Why aecuse Mr. Farradey of altruistio insincerity? I think his deserintion som ls delightful. Let's go tomorrow and see the cottage.
"If you will wait till Smuday," Farraday smilen, "I shall be delighted to drive you out. It might be easier for Mrs. Byrd."

Mary again demurred on the score of giving unusenssary trouble, but Stefan overrode her, ardi Farraday was obviously pleased with the plan. It was arranged that he should eall for them in his ear the following Sunday, and that they should huch with him and his mother.

When he had eft Stefan performed a little pas send around ther rom.
"Tra-la-la!" he sang ; "hided, Mary, trees, water. No more chimney pots, no more walking up atal down that tunnel of an avenue. See what it is to have admiring friends."

Mary flushed again. "Why will sou spoil everything by putting it like that?"

He stopped and patted her cheek teasingly.
"It's me they admire, Mary, the great artist, ereator of the famous Danaie," ...ad he skipped again, impishly.

Mary was obliged to laush. "You exasperating reature!" sle said, and went to bed, while he ran up to the studio to mull out the folding casel and sketching-low of his old Brittany days.

III

WHEN on the following Sunday morning Farraday drove up to the house, Mary was delighted to find Constance Elliot in the tonneau.
"Theodore has begun golting again, now that the snow has gone," she greeted her, "so that I am a grass wis" on holidays as well as all the week."
"Why don't you learn to play, too?" Mary asked, as they settled themselves, Stefan sitting in front with Farraday, who was driving.
"Oh, for your English feet, my dear!" sighed Constance. "They are bigger tuan mine-I dare say so, as I wear fours-but you can walk on them. I was brought up to be vain of my extremities, and have worn twoinch heels too long to be gond for more than a mile. The waks would kill me. Besides," she sighed again prettily, "dear Theodore is so much happier without me."
"How ean you, Constance!" objected Mary.
"Yes, my dear," went on the other, her beautiful little hands, which she seldom gloved, playing with the inevitable string of jade, "the result of modern specialization. Theodore is a darling, and in theory a Suffragist, but he has practised the matrimonial division of labor so long that he does not know what to do with the woman out of the home."
"This is Quee"sborough Bridge," she pointed out in a few minutes, as they sped up a huge iron-braced in178 cline. "It looks like right perprer castors on a intid, surmonnted by bayonets, but it is vire renn iont."
 put her in gerel spirits. She fooked abmut hor wibla ine derest as the car cmeron from the bridge into a stragn waste land of antomohile factorias, men stome. Fared business buildings, and tmmberlown worden rottames. Thn honses, in their disarray. as if ast like sumple lion regadless of plam. The woder simmed en divide a settled eivilization from pionecer eomotry, and as the brit the factories behind and emeroed into fiohls dotted with advertisements and wooden sharks llary was mominded of storic: she had read of the far West, or al Aast matia. Stefan leant back from the front seat, and wated at be view.
"Behold the tin can," he eried, "emblem of . Imerican civilization!" She saw that he was rifht ; the fiedes on either side were dotted with tins, botters. and other hasks of dimme , ast and gone. Gradnally. howerer, this stage was left aind: they beran to pass throngh villages of pleasant wooden houses painted white or crean, with green shutters, or groups of red-tiled stuce dwellings surrounded by gardens in the Engrish mamer. Soon these, too, were left, and real country appeared, prettily wooded, in which low-roofed homesteads clumer timidly to the roadside as if in search of company.
"What dear little honses!" Mary exclained.
"Yes," said Constance, "that is the Long Island farmhouse type, as good arehitecturally as anything America has produced, but abandoned in favor of Oriental bungalows, Italian palaees and French chiteanx."
" 1 should adore a little house like one of those."
"Wait till you see Mr. Farraday's cottage ; it's a lamb, and his home like it, only bigger. What ean one eall an augmented lamb? I ean only think of sheep, which docsn't sound well."
"I'm afraid we should say it was 'twee' in Eıgland," Mary smiled, "which sounds worse."
"Yes, I'd rather my house were a shecp than a 'twee,' becatise I do at least know that a sheep is useful, and I'm sure a 'twee' ean't be."
"It's not a noun, Constanee, but an adjective, meaning sweet," translated Mary, langhing. She loved Constance's nonsense because it was never more than that. Stefan's absurdities were always personal and, often, not without a hidden sting.
"Well," Constance went on, "you must be particularly 'twee' then, to James' mother, who is a Quaker from Philadelphia, and an American gentlewoman of the old sehool. His father was a New Englander, and took his pleasures sadly, as I tell James he does; but his mother is as warm as a dear little toast, and as pleasant-well-as the diuner bell."
"What eulinary similes, Constance!"
"My dear, from sheep to mutton is only a step, and I'm so hungry I can think only in terms of a menu. And that," she prattled on, "reminds me of Mr. MeEwan, whose face is the shape of a mutton ehop. He is sure to be there, for he spends half his time with James. Do you like him?"
"Yes, I do," said Mary; "increasingly."
"IIe's one of the best of souls. Have you heard his story?"
"No, has he one?"
"Indeed, yes," replied Constance. "The poor creature, who, by the way, adores you, is a vietim of Quixotism. When he first eame to New York he married a young girl who lived in his boarding-house and was in trouble by another man. Mae found her trying to eommit suieide, and, as the other man had disappeared, married her to keep her from it. She was pretty, I believe, and I think he was fond of her becanse of her terrible helplessness. The first baby died, luckily, but when his own was born a year or two later the poor girl was desperately ill, and lost most of what little mind she possessed. She developed two manias-the common spendthrift one, and the conviction that he was trying to divoree her. That was ten years ago. He has to keep her at sanitariums with a companion to check her extravaganee, and he pays her weekly visits to reassure her as to the divorce. She easts him nearly all he makes, in doctors' bills and so forth-he never spends a penny on himself, exeept for a cheap trip to Scotland once a year. Yet, with it all, he is on: of the most cheerful souls alive."
"Poor fellow!" said Mary. "What about the child?"
"He's alive, but she takes very little notice of him. He spends most of his time with Mrs. Farraday, who is a saint. James, poor man, adores children, and is glad to have him."
"Why hasn't Mr. Farraday married, I wonder?" Mary murmured under the eovering purr of the ear.
"Oh, what a waste," groaned Constance. "An ideal husband thrown away! Nobody knows, my dear. I think he was hit very hard years ago, and never got over it. He won't say, but I tell him if I weren't ten years older, and Theodore in evidence, I should marry him myself out of hand."

THE NEST-BUILDER

"I like him tremendously, but I don't think I should ever have felt attracted in that way," said Mary, who was much too natural a woman not to be interested in matrimonial spceulations.
"That's beeause you are two of a kind, simple and serious," nodded Constance. "I could have adored him."

They had been speeding along a country lane between tall oaks, and, breasting a hill, suddenly eanc upon the sea, half landlocked by curving bays and little promontorics. Beyond these, on the horizon, the coast of Conneeticut was softly visible. Mary breathed in great draughts of salt-tanged air.
"Oh, how good!" she exclaimed.
"Here we are," cried Constance, as the machine swung past white posts into a wooded drive, which curved and curved again, losing and finding glimpses of the sea. No buds were out, but each twig bulged with nobbons of new life; and the ground, brown still, had the swept and garnished look which the March winds leave behind for the tempting of Spring. Persephone had not risen, but the earth listened for her step, and the air held the high purified quality that presages ler coming.
"Lovely, lovely," breathed Mary, her eyes and clicelss glowing.

The car stopped under a porte cochère, before a long brown house of heavy clapboards, with shingled roof and green blinds. Farraday jumped down and helped Mary out, and the front door opened to reveal the shining grin of MeEwan, poised above the gray head of a little lady who advaneed with outstretched hand to greet them.
"My mother-Mrs. Burd," Farraday introduced.
"I am very pleased to mect thee. My son has told me so much about thee and tlyy husband. Thee must make thyself at home here,' beamed the little lady, with one of the most engaging smiles Mary had ever beheld.

THE NESTLING

Stefan was introduced in his turn, and made his best continental bow. He liked old ladies, who alnost invariably adored him. NeEwan greeted hinn with a "IIello," and shook hands warinly with the two women. They all moved into the hall, Mary under the wing of Mrs. Farraday, who presently took her upstairs to a bedroom.
"Thee must rest here before dinner,' said she, smoothing with a tiny hand the crocheted bedspread. "Ring this bell if there is anything thee wants. Shall I send Mr. Byrd up to thee?"
"Indeed, I'm not a bit tired," said Mary, who had never felt better.
"All the same I would rest a little if I were thee," Mrs. Farraday nodded wisely. Mary was fascinated ly her grammar, never laving met a Quaker before. The little lady, who barely reached her guest's shoulder, had such an air of mingled sweetness and dignity as to make Mary feel she must instinctively yield to her slightest wish. Obediently she lay down, and Mrs. Farraday covered her feet.
Mary noticed her fine white skin, soft as a baby's, the thousand timy lines romd her gentle eyes, her simple dress of brown silk with a cameo at the neek, her little, blue-veined hands. No wonder the son of sueh a woman impressed one with his extraordinary lindliness.

The little lady slipped away, and Mary, feeling unexpeeted pleasure in the quiet room and the soft bed, elosed her eyes gratefully.
At luneheon, or rather dinner, for it was obvious that

184 THE NEST-BUILDER

Mrs. Farraday kept to the old eustom of Sunday meals, a silent, shock-headed boy of about ten appeared, whom MeEwan with touching pride introduced as his son. IIe was dressed in a kilt and snall deerskin sporran, with the regulation heavy stoekings, tweed jacket and Eton collar.
"For Sundays only-we have to be Yankees on sehool days, eh, Jamie?" explained his father. The boy grimed in speechless assent, instantly looking a duplieate of McEwan.

Mary's heart warmed to him at once, he was so shy and elumsy ; but Stefan, who detested the mere suspicion of loutishness, favored him with an absent-minded stare. Mary, who sat on Farraday's right, had the boy next her, with his father beyond, Stefan being between Mrs. Farraday and Constance. The meal was served by a gray-haired negro, of manners so perfeet as tc suggest the ideal southern servant, already familiar to Mary in American fiction. As if in answer to a cue, Mrs. Farraday explained aeross the table that Moses and his wife had come from Philadelphia with her on her marriage, and had been born in the South before the war. Mary's literary sense of fitness was eompletely satisfied by this remark, which was received by Doses with a smile of gentle pride.
"Janues," said Constance, "I never get tired of your mother's house; it is so wonderful to have not one thing out of key."

Farraday smiled. "Bless you, she wouldn't change a footstool. It is all just as when she married, and nueh of it, at that, belonged to her mother."

This explained what, with Mary's keen eye for interi-ors, had puzzled her whell they first arrived. She hat expected to see more of the perfect taste and mowle lige displayed in Farraday's office, instead of whiein the house, though dignified and hospitable, lacked all tanes of the comoisseur. She noticed in particular the complete absence of any color sense. All the woodwork was varnished brown, the hangings were of dull brown velvet or dark tapestry, the carpets toneless. Her bedroom had been lung with white dimity, edged with erochet-work, but the furniture was of somber cherry, and the chint\% of the couch-cover brown with yellow flowers. The library, into which she looked from where she sat, was furnished with high glass-doored bookeases, turned walnut tables, and stuffed chairs and couches with carved walnut rims. Down eath window the shade was lowered half way, and the light was further obscured by lace curtains and heavy draperies of plain velvet. The pietures were mostly family portraits, with a few landscapes of doubtful merit. There were no flowers anywhere, except one small vase of daffodils upon the dinuer table. Aecording to all modern canons the house should have been hideous; but it was not. It held garnered with loving faith the memories of another day, as a bowl of potpourri still holds the sun of long dead summers. It fitted absolutely the quiet kindliness, the faded face and soft brown dress of its mistress. It was keyed to her, as Constance had understood, to the last. il.
"Yes," said Farraday, sri ng down the table at his mother, "she could hardly bring herself to let me build my picture gallery on the end of the house-nothing but Cliristian charity enabled her to yield."

The old lady smiled baek at her tall son almost like a

186  THE NEST-BUILDER

sweetheart. "IIe humors me," she said; "he knows I'm a foolish old woman who love my nest as it was first prepared for me."
"Oh, I ean so well understand that," said Mary.
"Do you mean to say, Mrs. Farraday," interposed Stefan, "that you have lived in this one house, without ehanging it, all your ma.ried life?"

She turned to him in simple surprise. "Why, of course; my husband chose it for me."
"Marvelous!" said Stefan, who felt that one week of those brown hangings would drive him to suicide.
"Nix on the home-sweet-home business for yours, eh, Byrd?" threw in McEwan with his glint of a twinkle.
"Boy," interposed their little hostess, " why will thee always use such shoeking slang? How ean I teach Jamie English with his father's example before him?" She shook a tiny finger at the offender.
"Ma'am, if I didn't sling the lingo, begring your pardon, in my office, they would think I was a highbrow, and then-good night Mac!"
"Don't believe him, Mother," said Farraday. "It isn't policy, but affection. He loves the magazine crowd, and likes to do as it does. Besides," he smiled, "he's a 'inguistic specialist."
"You think slang is an indication of local patriotism?" asked Mary.
"Certainly," said Farraday. "If we love a place we adopt its customs."
"That's quite true," Stefan agrced. "In Paris I used the worst argot of the quarter, but I've always spoken straightforward English because the only slang I knew in my own tongue reminded me of a place I loathed."
"Stefian used to be dreadfully unpatriotic, Mrs. Farraday," explained Miry, "but he is outgrowing it."
"Am I ?" Stefan asked rather pointedly.
"-irt," said MeEwan grandly, " is aternational ; Bym! belongs to the world." He raised his glass of lemomale. and ostentationsly drank Stefan's health. The others langhed at him, and the eonversation veered. Mary absorbed herself in trying to draw out the bashful Jamic, and Stefan listened while his hostess talked on her favorite theme, that of her son, James Farrallay.

They had coffee in the pieture gallery, a beantifnl room which Farraday had extended beyond the drawingroom, and furnished with perfect examples of the best Colonial periorl. It was hung almost eniirely with the work of Americans, in particular landseapes by Inness, Homer Martin, and George Munn, while over the fireplaee was a fine mother and child by Mary Cassatt. For the first time sinee their arrival Stefan showed real interest. and leaving the others, wandered round the room critically absorbing each painting.
"Well, Farraday," he said at the end of his tomr, "I must say you have the best of judgment. I should have been mighty glad to pinint one or two of those myself." II is tone indie 'ed that more could not be said.

Meamwhile, Mary er id hardly wait for the real objeret of their expedition, the little house. When at last the car was announced, Mrs. Farraday's bonnet and cloak brought by a maid, and everybody, Jamie ineluded. fitted into the machine, Mary felt her heart beating with exeitement. Were they going to have a real little louse for their baby? Was it to be born out here by the sea, instead of in the dusty, overcrowded eity? She strained her eyes down the road. "It's only half a mile," ealled Farraday from the wheel, "and a mile and a half from the station." They swung cown a hill, up again, round a bend, and there was a grassy platean overlooking the water, backed by a tree-clad slope. Nestling under the trees, but facing the bay, was just such a little house as Mary had admired along the road, low and smig, shingleal on walls and roof, painted white, with green shatters and a little columned porel at the front door. A small barn stood near; a little hedge divided house from lane; evidences of a flower garden showed under the windows. "Oh, what a duck!" Mary exelaimed. "Oh, Stefan!" She could almost I we wept.

188

Farraday helped her down.
"Mrs. Byrd," said he with his most kindly smile, "here is the key. Would you like to unlock the door yourself?"

She blushed with pleasu"e. "Oh, yes!" she eried, and turned instinctively to look for Ste fan. Ite was standing at the platean's edge, serutinizing the view. She called, but he did not hear. Then she took the key and, hurrying up the little walk, entered the house alone.

A moment later Stefan, hailed stentoriously by MeEwan, followed her.

She was standing in a long sitting-room, low-ceilinged and white-walled, with window-seats, geranimes on the sills, brass andirons on the hearth, an cight-day clock, a small old fashioned piano, an colk desk, a chint\%-eovered grandmother's chair, a gate-legged table, and a braided rag hearth-rig. Her hands were elasped, her eyes shining.
"Oh, Stefan!", she exelaimed as she heard his step. "Isn't it a darling? Wouldn't it be simply ideal for us?"

THE NESTLING

"It seems just right, and the view is splendid. There's a good deal that's paintable here."
"Is there? I'in so slacl. That makes it perfeet. Look at the furniture, Stefan, every bit right."
"And the moldiners," he added. "All handent, do you see? The whole place is actually old. What a lark!" Ite appeared ahmost as pleased ass she.
"IIare come the others. Let's go upstairs, darest," she whispered.

There were four bedrooms, and a bathroom. Whe main rom had a four-post bed, and opening ont of it was a smaller room, almost empty. In this dary stoon for some minutes, measuring with her eye the height of the window from the floor, mentally placing pertain small furnishings. "It would be ideal, simply idenl," she repeated to herself. Stefan was looking out of the window, again absorbed in the view. She would have liked so well to share with him her tenderness over the little room, but he was all ummindful of its meaning to her, and, as always, his heedlessness made expression hard for her. She was still eommuning with the future when he turned from the window.
"Come along, Mary, let's go downstairs again."
I'hey found the others waiting in the sitting-room, and Farraday detaehed Stefan to show him a couple of old prints, while Mrs. Farraday led Constance and Mary to an exploration of the kitehen. Chancing to look lack from the hall, Mary saw that MeEwan had scated himself in the grandmother's chair, and was holding the heavy shy Jamic at his knee, one arm thrown round him. The boy's eyes were fixed in dumb devotion on his father's face.

100 THE NEST-HUILINER

"'The two poor lomely things," she thomght.
I'loe little kiteloel whs spotless, tiled shombler-high, and phinted blow alowe. Skatinst one wall arow of eopper same pans gromed their fat montent, erbow bey the paite shine of an opposing row of almommo. Smow larder s: Ive: showed thromell ome little dow : thromelt amother, lammer tmse were visible. 'Tlum was a mondorn roal siose, with a builere. The ghaturs were small, but pere beamed with pride as they looked aboat them.
"Hle did it all, bobifit every pot amblam, artangod old Cotter died-he wonhl mot let Jin:es put them ins. Mry boy loves this cottager le sometimes spemes several days hore all alome, when loe is very timed. Ho doessat even like me to semd dosiss down bat of comse I won't hear of that." Ste showk her heal with smiling finality. There were some things, hor mamer surerested, that little boys eomld not be allowed.
"Bat, Mrs. Farmalay," Mary exclamed, "how can we possibly take the hotse from him if he uses it?"
"Mly dear," the litfle lady's hamd lighted on Mury's arm, "when thee knows my James better, thee will know that his happiness lies in helping his: friends find theirs. He wonld be deply disappointed if thee did not take it," and hor hand squeczed Mary's reassuringly.
"We are too wonderfnlly luek-I don't know how to express my gratitude," Mary answered.
"I think the good Lord sends us what we deserve, my dear, whether of good or ill," the little lady replied, smiling wisely.

Constance sighed contentedly. "Oh, Mrs. Farraday, you ares so yod for us all. I'm a modern backelider, and hardly ever go to churd, but jou alwajs make me feel as if I hall just beoll."
"Dackslider, Comstance? "Tlyy own works praise thee, and thy ehihlren rise up and call the lhesisel-thy husband alse," " quoted their lowions.
"Wedl, I don't knw if my lons aml Thmelore call me ness knews I work hard rmorght low them."
"I ve beliewed in suffrave all mes life, like all lromods," Mrs. F'arraday answered, "birt where the has worked I have only proyed for it."
"If proyers are heard, I am surw yours shand rount more than me work, drar lady," said Comstance, affectionately uressines the ofloer os hambl.

The little (quaker's eyes were bright as she looked at her friend.
"Alr, my dear, thee is too gemerons to an old woman:"
Mary loved this litho dialogite. "What dears all my new friends are," she thought; "how truly good," All the world seemed full of love to her in these fays; her heart blossomed out to these kind people; she fohded them in the arms of her spirit. All alont, in matnre and in human kind, slie felt the spring lomeroning, 'nd within herself she felt it most of all. lant of this Mary could express mothing, save through lier face - she had never looked more beautiful.

Coming into the dining room she found Farraday watching her. Ile seemed tired. She put out her hand.
"May we really have it? You are sure?"
"You like it?" he smiled, holding the hand.
She flushed with the effort to express herself. "I adore it. I can't thank you.'
"Please don't," he answered. "You don't know what pleasure this gives me. Come as soon as you can ; everything is ready for you."
"And abont the rent?" she asked, hating to speak of money, but knowing Stefan would forget.
"Dear Mrs. Byrd, I had so much rather lend it, but I know you wouldn't like that. Pay me what you paid for your first home in New York."
"Oh, but that would be alisurd," she demurred.
"Make that eoneession to my pride in our friendship," he smiled back.

She saw that she could not refuse without ungracious. ness.

Stefan had disappeared, but now eume quiekly in from the kitehen door.
"Farraday," he called, "I ve been looking at the barn; you don't use it, I see. If we eome, should you mind my having a north light eut in it? With that it would make an ideal workshop."
"I should be delighted," the other answered; "it's a good idea and will make the place more valuable. I had the barn eleaned out thinking some one might like it for a garage."
"We shan't rim to such an extravagance yet awhile," laughed Mary.
"A bicycle for me and the station hack for Mary," Stefan smmed up. "I suppose there is slich a thing at Crab's Bay?"
"She won't have to walk," Farraday answered.
Started on practical issines, Mary's mind had flown to the need of a telephone to link them to her doctor. "May we install a 'phone?" she asked. "I never lived with one till two months ago, but already it is a confirmed vice with me."
"Mayn't I have it put in for you-there should bo one here," said he.
"Oh, no, please!"
"At least let me armange for it," he urged.
"Now, son, thee must not keep Mrs. liyrd out too late. Get he home before smmdown," Mrs. Fiaraday's voice admonished. Obediently, every one moved toward the hall. At a word from MeEwan, the mute Jamie ran to open the tonnean door. Farraday stopped to lock the kitchen entrance and fomb MeEwan on the little poreh as he emerged, while the others were busy settling themselves in the car. As Farraday turned the heary front door lock, his friend's hand fell on his shoulder.
"Ought ye to do it, Janes?" MeEwan asked quietly. Farraday raised his eyes, and looked steadily at the other, with his slow smile.
"Yes, Mae, it's a good thing to do. In any case, I shouk'in't have been likely to marry, you know." The two frinuds took their places in the car.

IV

AFTER much consideration from Mary, the Byrds decided to give up their recently aequired flat, but to keep the old studio. She felt they should not attempt to earry three rents through the summer, but, on the otleer hand, Stcfan was still working at his Demeter, using an Italian model for the boy's figure, and could not finish it conveniently elsewhere. Then, too, lie expressed a wish for a pied-i-terre in the city, and as Mary had very tender associations with the little studio she was glad to think of keeping it.

Stefan was working fitfully at this time. IIe would have spurts of energy followed by fits of depression and disgust with his work, during which he would leave the house and take long rides uptown on the tops of omnibuses. Mary could not see that these excursions in searel of air calmed his nervousness, and she concluded that the spring fever was in his blood and that he needed a change of scene at least as muth as she did.

Alout this time lie sold his five remaining drawings of New York to the Pan-Ameriean Magazine, a progressive monthly. They gained considerable attention from the art world, and were seized upon by certain groups of radicals as a sermon on the capitalistic system. On the strength of them, Stefan was hailed as that rarest of all beings, a politieally minded artist, and became popular in quarters from which his intolerance had bitherto barred him.

It entertained him hurely to be prochaimed as at champion of democraey, for he had made the drawings in impish hatred not of a class but of American civilization as a whole.

Their bank account, in spite of much heightened living expenses, remained substantial by reason of this new sale, but Stefan was as indifferent as ever to its control, and Mary's sense of cantion was little diminished. Itwo growing comprehension of him wamed her that their position was still insecure; he remained, for all his success, an unknown quantity as a producer. She wanted him to assume some interest in their affairs, and suggested separate bank accomits, but he berged off.
"Let me have a signatme at the bank, so that I cam eash cheeks for personal expenses, but don't ask me to keep accounts, or know how much we have," he said. "If you find I am spending too much at any time, just tell me, and I will stop."

Further than this she could not get him to discuss the matter, and saw that she must thiil: out alone some method of bookkeeping which would be fair to them both, and would establish a record for future use. Cltimately she transferred her own money, less her private expenditures during the winter, to a separate account, to be used for all her personal expenses. The old aecount she put in both their names, and made out a monthly schetule for the household, beyond which she determined never to draw. Anything she could save from this amount she destined for a savings bank, but over and above it' she felt that her lmsband's eamings were his, and that she could not in honor interfere with them. Mary was almost painfully conseientions, and this plan cost her many heart-searchings before it was complete.

196

THE NES'T-BUILDER

After her baby was born she intended to continue her writing; she did not wish ever to draw on Stefan for her private purse. So far at least, she would live up to feminist principles.

There was much to be done before they could leave the city, and Mary had practically no assistance from Stefan in her arrangements. She would ask his advice about the packing or disposal of a picce of furniture, and he would make some suggestion, often impracticable; but on any further questioning he rould run his hands through his hair, or thrust them into his pockets, looking either vague or nervous 'Why fuss about such things, dear?" or "Do just as you like," or "I':n sure I haven't a notion," were his most frequent answers. He developed a habit of leaving his work and following Mary restlessly from room to room as she packed or sorted, which she found rather wearing.

On one such occasion-it was the day before they were to leave-she was carrying a large pile of baby's elothes from her bedroom to a trunk in the sitting-room, while Stefan stood humped before the fireplace, smoking. As she passed him he frowned nervously.
"IIow heavily you tread, Mary,' he jerked out. She stood stock-still and flushed painfully.
"I think, Stefan," she said, with the tears of feeling which came over-readily in these days welling to her eyes, "instead of saying wat you might come and help me to carry these things."

IIe looked completely eontrite. "I'm sorry, dearest, it was a silly thing to say. Forgive me," and he kissed her apologetically, taking the bundle from her. He offered to lielp scveral times that afternoon, but as he never knew where anything was to go, and fidgeted from foot to foot while he hung about her, she was obliged at last to plead release from his efforts.
"Stefan dear," she said, giving him rather a harassed smile, "you evidently find this kind of thing a bore. Why don't you run out and leave me to get on quietly with it?"
"I know I've been rotten to you, and I thought you wanted me to help,' he explained, in a self-exculpatory tone.

She stroked his cheek maternally. "Rum along, dearest. I can get on perfectly well alone."
"You're a brick, Mary. I think I'll go. This kin? of thing-" he flung his arm toward the disordered room"is too utterly unharmonious." And kissing her meehanically he hastened out.

That night for the first time in their marriage he did not return for dinner, but telephoned that he was spending the evening with friends. Mary, tired out with her paeking, ate her meal alone and went to bed immediately aftervia ds. His absenee produeed in her a dull heartaehe, but she was too weary to ponder over his whereabouts.

Early next morning Mary telephoned Miss Mason. Stefan, who had eome home late, was still asleep when the Sparrow arrived, and by the time he had had his breakfast the whole flat was in its final stage of disruption. A few pieces of furniture were to be sent to the eottage, a few more stored, and the studio was to be returned to its original omnibus status. Mrs. Corriani, priestess of family emergeneies, had been summoned from the depths: the Sparrow had donned an apron, Mary a smock; Lily, the colored maid, was packing china into a barrel, surrounded by writhing seas of exeelsior.

198 THE NEST-BUILDER

For Stefan, the flat might as well have been given over to the Furies. IIe fetehed his hat.
"Mary," he said, "I'm not painting again until we have moved. Djimns, Afrits and Goddesses should be allowed to perform their spiritings unseen of mortals. I shall go and sit in the Metropolitan and contemplate Rodin's Penseur-he is so spacious."
"Very well, dearest," said Mary brightly. She had slept away her low spirits. "Don't forget Mr. Farraday is sending lis car in for us at three o clock."

ITe looked nonplused. "You don't mean to say we are movin! ${ }^{\text {f to-day?" }}$
"Yes, you goose," sli laughed, "don't you remember?"
"I'm frightfully sorry, Mary, but I made an engagement for this evening, to go to the theatre. I knew you would not want to eome," he added.

Mary looked blank. "But, Stefam," she exelaimed, "everything is arranged! We are dining with the Farradays. I told yon several tines we were moving on the fourtl. You make it so difficult, dear, by not taking any interest." Her voice trembled. She had worked and planned for their flitting for a week past, was all eaŗerness to be gone, and now he, who had been equally keen, seemed utterly indifferent.

Ie fidgeted meonfortably, looking eontrite yet rebellious. Mary was at a loss. The sparrow, however, promptly raised her erest and exlibited a claw.
"Land sakes, Mr. Byrd," she piped, "you are a mighty fine artist, but that don't prevent your being a husband first these days! Men are all alike-." she turned to Mary-"always ready to skedaddle off when there's work to be done. Now, young man-" she pointed a mandatory finger-"'you run and telephone your friends to call the party off." Her roice shrinled, her beady eyes snapped; she looked exactly like one of her namesakes, ruffled and quarreling at the edge of its nest.

THE NESTLING

Stefan burst out laughing. "All right, Miss Sparrow, smooth your feathers. Mary, I'm a mud-headed idliot -I forgot the whole thing. Pay un atteution to my vagaries, dearest, I'll be at the door at three." IIe kissed her warmly, and went out humming, banging the door behind him.
"My father was the same, and my brothers," the Sparrow philosophized. "Spring-cleaning and moring took every ounce of sense out of " Mary sighed. Her zest for the preparations had depa. 'd.

Presently, seeing her languor, Miss Mason insisted Mary should lie down and leave the remaining work to her. The only resting place left was the old studio, where their divan had been replaced. Thither Mary mounted, and lying amidst its dusty disarray, traced in memory the months she had spent there. It had been their first home. Here they had had their first duarmel and their first success, and here had come to her her ammenciation. Though they were keeping the room, it would never hold the same meaning for her again, and though she already loved their new home, it hart her at the last to bid their first good-bye. Perhips it was a trick of fatigue, but as she lay there the ennviction came to her that with to-day's change some part of the early glamone of marriage was to go, that not ewen the coming of her ehild could bring to life the memories this room contained. She longed for her husband, for his voice calling her the old, dear, foolish manes. She felt alone, and fearful of the future.

200  THE NEST-BUILDER

"My grief," exclaimed Miss Mason from the door an hour later. "I told you to go to sleep 'n here you are wide awake and erying!"

Mary smiled shanefacedly.
"I'm just tired, Sparrow, that's all, and have been indulging in the 'vapors.'" She squeezed her friend's hand. "Let's have some luneh."
"It's all ready, and Lily with her hat 'n coat on. Come right downstairs-it's most two o'elock."

Mary jumped up, amazed at the time she had wasted. Her spell of depression was over, and she was her usual eliecrful self when, at three o'elock, she heard Stefan's feet bounding up the stairs for the last time.
"Tra-la, Mary, the ear is here!" he ealled. "Thank God we are getting out of this eity! Good-by, Miss Sparrow, don't peek me, and eome and see us at Crab's Bay. Mareh, Lily. A riverderei, Signora Corriani. Come, dearest." He bustled them all out, scized two suiteases in one hand and Mary's elbow in the other, chattered his few words of Italian to the janitress, ehaffed Miss Mason, and had them all laughing by the time they reached the strect. He seemed in the highest spirits, his moods of the last weeks forgotten.

As the ear started he kissed his fingers repeatedly to Miss Mason and waved his hat to the inevitable assemblage of small boys.
"The country, darling!" he eried, pressing Mary's hand under the rug. "Farewell to ugliness and squalor! How happy we are going to be!"

Mary's hand pressed his in reply.

IT was late April. The wooded slopes behind "The Byrdsnest,'" as Mary had ehristened the cottage, were peppered with a pale film of green. The lawn before the house shone with new grass. Upon it, in the early morning, Mary watched beantitul birds of types unknown to her, searehing for nest-making material. She admired the large, handsome robins, so serious and stately after the merry pertness of the English sort, but ber favorites were the bluebirds, and another kind that looked like greenish canaries, of which she did not know the name. None of them, she thought, had such melodious song as at lome in England, but their brilliant plumage was a eonstant delight to her.

Daffodils were springing up in the garden, crocuses were out, and the blue seylla. On the downward slope toward the bay the brown furry heads of ferns had begun to push stoutly from the earth. The spring was awake.

Stefan seemed thoronghly eontented again. He had his north light in the barn, but seldom worked there, being absorbed in outdoor sketching. ITe was making many small studies of the trees still bare against the gleam of water, with a dust of green upon them. He could get a number of valuable notes here, he told Mary.

During their first two weeks in the enuntry his restlessness had often recurred. IIe had gone back and forth to the city for work on his Demeter, and had even slept there on several oceasions. But one morning he wakened Nary by eoming in from an early ramble full of joy in the spring, and announeing that the big picture was now as good as he eould make it, and that he was done with the town. He threw baek the blinds and called to her to look at the day.

202  THE NEST-BUILDER

"It's vibrant, Mary ; life is waking all about us." He turned to the bed.
"You look like a beautiful white rose, cool with the dew."

She blushed-he liad forgotten lately his old habit of pretty speech-making. He eame and sat on the bed's edge, holding her hand.
"I've had my restless devil with me of late, swectheart," he said. "But now I feel renewed, and happy. I shan't want to leave you any more." IIe kissed her with a gravity at which slie miglit have wondered had she been more thoroughly awake. His tone was that of a man who makes a promise to himself.

Sinee that morning he had been consistently eheerful and earefree, more attentive to Mary than for some time past, and pleased with all his surroundings. She was overjoyed at the ehange, and for her own part never tired of working in the house and garden, striving to make more perfeet the atmosphere of simple homeliness whieh Farraday had first imparted to them. Lily was fascinated by her kitehen and little white bedroom.
"This surely is a eute little house, yes, ma'am," she would exelaim emphatieally, with a grin.

Lily was a small, ehocolate-colored negress, with a neat figure, and the ever ready smile which is God's own gift to the raee. Mary, who hardly remembered having seen a negro till she came to Ameriea, had none of the color-prejudice which grows up in biracial communitics. She found Lily civil, checrful, and intelligent, and ielt a sincere liking for her which the other reciprocated with a growing devotion.

THE NESTLING

Often in these days a passerby-had there been anycould have heard a threefold chorus rising about the cottage, a spring-song as meonscious as the birds'. From the kitehen Lily's voiee rose in the endless refrain of a hymn; Mary's clear tones traveled down from the little room beside her uwn, where she was preparing a place for the expected one; and Stefan's whistle, or his suatches of French song, resomeded from woods or barn. Youth and hope were in the house, youth was in the air and earth.

Farraday's gardens were the pride of the neighborhood, these and the library expressing him as the house did his mother. Several times he sent down an arinful of flowers to the Byrdsnest, and, one Sunday morning, Mary had just finisled arranging sueh a buneh in her vases when she heard the chug of an automobile in the lanc. She looked out to see Constance, a veiled figure beside her, stopping a runabout at the gate. Delighted, she hastened to the door. Constance hailed her.
"Mary, behold the chariotecr! Theodore has given me this maehine for suffrage propaganda during the summer, and I aehicved my driver's license yesterday. I'm so vain I'm going to make Felicity design me a gown with a peacoek's tail that I can spread. I've brought her with me to show off too, and because she needed air. How are you, bless you? May we come in?"

Not waiting for an answer, she jumped down and hugged Mary, Miss Berber following in more leisurely fashion. Mary could not help wishing Constance had strangers. Howerore, she showk hamde with Miss Berter, mat lad them both into the sittimer rome.

204

'TIE NES'T-13UILIDER

"simply delicoms!" exdamos Constamer, ghmeing likr a transormelental dairy maid! This plare was mate for yom, and how son'se improwed it. lamk, Felinity, at her clint\% and hir thowes, und her cunum! pair of "hina shophordasses!" shar ran from one thing to antof here, westatially aprociative.
 Was absorbed in the lamgnid remosal of a satin cont amd inmodihe yards of apple green wilus, ('onstance held ther thowr.
"look at her pair of lowehirds silling along the cortain poles, as time as hmmans! Whore did! foum thand that woolen cage? And that white cottom dress? Yousmell of lavoder ame an ironing hoard! Oh, dear," she begill arain, "driving is very worring, nud I should like a cooktail, hat I must have milk. Dilk, my dear Mary, is the only eonerivahle hererage in this honse. Have yon a dow? You morlt ta have a (ow-a brimillod cow-also a lamb: 'llary had, et cotoma. Jy dar, stop me. Enthusiasm comberts me into an 'arreable rattle,' as they usid to rall our great-memblmothers."
"Subthe yourself with this," hanghed Mary, holding out the desired glass of milk. "Miss Berber, can I get ansthing for yon?"

Folicity be this time was muwapped, and had disposed herself upon a window-seat, her hack to the light.
"Wine wr water, Mrs. Byru; I do not drink milk," she breathed, lighting a cigarette.

 I "ppear in "romilik" this?" Sher gave a laint shrme. "At best, a Pilse tome in a chromatie lummony. Fin are: motirnly in key."
 smoke. "Vory wall thought ont -mmsinally "lower- for a layman," sle attored, and was still, will dre surgers. tion of a sibyl whose orimp has cerased to spatak.

Mary tried uot fo find her manmer irritatines, hal "omld not wholly dispel the impression that hise biolor hal hithally putronizal her.

She lamghed pheamantly.
"I'm afraid I cim"t claim to have bern entiden loy any subtle theories-l have merely collected therether the kind of things I an fond of."
"Mary decoratos will her hrart, Falicity, yon with your hend," said Constance, setting down hor empty tmubler.
"I'in afraid I shonk find the heart too crratic: a gnide to art. Knowlediee, Mrs. Isyrd, knowledme must snpplement feeling,' said Felicity, with a gresture of finality.
"Really!" answered Mary, falling back upom her most "orrect English mamer. There was nothinif (lse to say. "She is cither cheeky, or a bromide," she thought.

THE NEST-BUILDER

"Felieity," exclaimed Constance, "don't adopt your professional manner; you can't take us in. You know you are an outrageous humbug."
"Dear Comie," replied the other with the ghost of a smile, "you are always so amusing, and so much more wide awake in the morning than I an."

Conversation languished for a minute, Constance having embarked on a cake. For some reason which she could not analyze, Mary felt in 110 great hurry to eall Stefan from the barn, should he be there.

Felicity rose. "May we not see your garden, Mrs. Byrd?"
"Certainly," said Mary, and led the way to the door. Felieity slipped out first, and wandered with her delicate step a little down the path.
"Isn't it darling!" exelaimed Constance from the poreh, surveying the flower-strewn grass, the feathery trees, and the pale gleam of the water. Mary began to show her some seen plantings, in particular a rose-bed which was her last addition to the garden.
"I see you have a barn," said Felicity, flitting back to them with a hint of animation. "Is it picturesque inside? Would it lend itself to treatment?" She wandered toward it, and there was nothing for the others to do but follow.
"Oh, yes," explained Mary, "my husband has converted it into a studio. He may be working there now -I had been meaning to call him."

She felt a trifle uncomfortable, almost as if she had put herself in the wrong.
"Coo-00, Stefan," she called as they neared the barn, Felicity still flitting ahead. The door swung open, and there stood Stefan, pallette in haud, serewing up his eyes in the sun.

As they lit on his approaching visitor an expression first of astonishment, and then of something very like displeasure, crossed his face. At sight of it, Mary's spirits subeonsciously responded by a distinet npward lift. Stefan waved his brush withont shaking hauds, and then, secing Constance, broke into a smile.
"How delightful, Mrs. Elliot! How did you come? By auto? And you drove Miss Berber? We are lionored. You are our first visitors exeept the Farratays. Come and see my studio."

They trooped into the ruaint little barn, which appeared to wear its big north liglit rather primly, as a girl her first low-neeked gown. It was unfurnished, save for a table and easel, several canvases, and an old arm-ehair. Felicity glanced at the sketches.
"In pastoral mood again," she commented, with what might have been the faintest note of sareasm. Stefan's cychrows twitehed nervously.
"There's nothing to see in here-these are the merest sketches," he said abruptly. "Come along, Mrs. Elliot, I've been working sinee before breakfast; let's say goodmorning to the flowers." And with his arm linked through hers he piloted Constance back toward the lawn.
"Mr. Byrd ought never to wear tweed, do you think? It makes him look heavy," remarked Felicity.

Again Mary had to suppress a fecling of irritation. "I rather like it," she said. "It's so comfy and English."
"Ycs?" breathed Fchicity vagucly, walking on.
Suddenly she appeared to have a return of animation.

She floated forward quickly for a few steps, turned with a swaying movement, and waited for Mary with hands and feet poised.
"'The grass under one's feet, Mrs. Byrd, it makes them glad. One could almost dance!'"

Again she fluttered ahad, this time overtaking Constance and Stefan, who had halted in the middle of the lawn. She swayed before them on tiptoe.
"Connie," she was saying as Mary eame up, "why does one not more often dance in the open?"

Though her lids still drooped she was half smiling as she swayed.
"It may be the spring; or perhaps I have caught the pastoral mood of Mr. Byrd's work; but I should like to dance a little. Music,' her palms were lifted in repudiation, "is unnecessary. One has the birds."
"Good for you, Felicity! That will be fun," Constance exclaimed delightedly. "You don't dance half often enongh, bad girl. Come along, people, let's sit on the porch steps."

They arranged themselves to watch, Constance and Mary on the upper step, Stefan on the lower, his shonlders against his wife's knces, while Felicity dexterously slipped off her sandals and stockings.

Her dress, modeled probably on that of the eentral figure in Botticelli's Spring, was of white chiffon, embroidered with occasional formal sprigs of green leaves and hyacinth-blue liowers, and kilted up at bust and thigh. Her loosely draped sleeves hung barely to the elbow. A line of green crossed from the shoulders under each breast, and her hair, tightly bound, was decorated with another nimrow band of green. She looked younger than in the city-almost virginal. Stooping low, she gathered a himdful of bue scylla from the grass, Mary barely claceking an exclanation at this ravishing of her beloved bulbs. Then Felicity lay down upon the rrass; her eyes closed; she secmed asleep. They waited alently for some minutes. Stefan began to tidget.

THE NESTLING

Suddenly a robin called. Felicity's eves opened. They looked ealm and dewy, like a childs. She raised her head-the robin called again. Felieity looked abont her, at the flowers in her hamd, the trees, the sky. Hel face broke into smiles, she rose tall, taller, feet on tiptoe. hands reaeling skyward. It was the waking of spriner Then she began to dance.

Gone was the old languor, the dreany, hushed steps of her former method. Now she appeared to dart about the lawn like a swallow, following the ealls of the birds. She would stand poised to listen, her car would catel a twitter, and she was gone; flitting, skimming, seeming not to touch the earth. She danced to the flowers in her hand, to the trees, the sky, her face aglint with changing smiles, her skirts rippling like water.

At last the blue flowers seemed to elaim her solely. She held them sminward, held them close, always swaying to the silent melody of the spring. She kissed them, pressed them to her heart; she sank downward, like a bird with folding wings, above a chmp of seylla; her arins encireled them, her head bent to her knees-she was still.

Constance broke the spell with prolonged applause; Mary was breathless witl admiration; Stefan rose, and after prowling restlessly for a moment, hurried to the daneer and stooped to lift her.

As if only then eonscious of her audience. Felicity looked up, and both the other women noticed the expression that flashed arooss her fare before she took the I offered hamd. It seemed eompommbed of trimmph, challengre, and something else. Mary again felt uneomfortable, and Constance os quick brain signaled a warning.
"Surely not getting into mischief, are yom, Velicity?" she mentally questioned, and instantly began to cast about for two and two to put together.
"Woulerful!" Stefan was saying. "You surely must have wings-great, butterfly ones-only we are too dull to see them. You were exactly like one of my pietures come to life." He was visibly excited.
"Hnsband disposid of, available lovers unattractive, asks me to drive her ont here; that's one half," Constances mind raced. "Wife on the shelf, variable temprament, stulio in town; and that's the other. I've fomm two and two; I hope to gooklness they won't make four, ${ }^{\prime}$ she sioned to herself anxionsly.

Mary meanwhile was thanking Miss Berber. She notied that the dancer was purfectly dool-not a hair ruffled by her efforts. She looked as smooth as a bird the draws in its feathers after flight. Stefan was probahi. observing this, too, sho thonght; at any rate he was hovering about, staring at Felicity, and rmming his hands through his hair. Mary eould not be sure of his expression; he seemed uneasy, as if discomfort mingled with his pleasure.

They had had a rare and lovely entertaimment, and yet no one appeared wholly pleased except the daneer herself. It was very odd.

Constance looked at her wateh. "Now, Felieity, this has all been ideal, but we must be getting on. I 'phoned James, you know, and we are lunching there. I was sure Mrs. Byrd wouldn't want to be bothered with us."

TIIE NESTLING

Mary demurred, with a word as to Lily's caparities, hut Constance was firm.
"No, my dear, it's all arranged. hesides, you meril peace and quiet. Felicity, where are your things? Thank you, Mr. Myrd, in the sitting-room. Mary, yon doar, I abore you amb your honse-I shall come asain soon. Where are my ghoves?" she was all "merery, helping Pelieity with her veil, settling her own hat, kissBug Mary, and erankiner the rmabout - an operation she would not allow Stefan to attempt for her-with hew usual effervesernt efficioney. "I'il no idea it was so late!" she exelaimed.

As Felicity was hamed by Sitefan into the car, she murmured something in Frenelt, (omstanere moterel, to which he shook his head with a nervons frown. As the marhine started, le was left staring monlily after it down the lane.
"Thee is earlier than I expected," little Mrs. Farraday said to Constance, when they arriverl at the house. "I am afraid we shall have to kerp thee waiting for thy lunch for half an hour or more."
"How glad I shall be-" Stofan turued to Mary, half irritably-"when this baby is born, and you can be active again."

He ate his lunch in silence, and left the table abruptly at the end. Nor did she see him again until dinner time, when he eame in tired out, his boots whitened with road dust.
"Where have you been, dearest?" she asked. "I've been quite anxious about you."
"Just walking," he answered shortly, and went up to his reme. The tears ame to her eres, bat she blinkent them awiye resohately. She menst not mimd, must not sho: him that she even dremmed of any commedion betwe 'rl his mombenss and the events of the morning.

"lly how mast be stronger than that, now of all times," thoment Mary. "Iftrmards aftomarols it will be all right." She smiled confidently to herself.

IT was the end of June. Mary's resebmine: were in fut! bhom and the little gardon was lamgind witly the seent of them. The mesting birds hat all hateled their broods-rerery morning now Mary watehed from her bedrom wintow the caretind parents barying worms and inseds into the trees. She always fooken for them the nement she got up. She womblave lowed to hang far ont of the window as she msed to do in her ohd home in Einglaml, and call grod-morning to here litthe friemds-but she was hemmed in by the bromze wire of the windowsererns. These affereted her ahmost like prison bars ; but Lomg Islamd's smmmer seonirer lad come, and after a few experiones of nights sumg sherepless by the persistent horn of the enemy and made aromizing by his sting, she welemod the sereens as deliverers. The mosquitoes apart, Mary had adored the long, warin days -not too hot as yet on the Byrdsmest's shaty eminemerand the perpotually smiling skies, so different from the sulky heavers of Eugland. But she began to ferl very heavy, and fourd it increasingly diffirnlt to kerep eom, so that slee counted the days till her deliverance. She frlt no fear of what wars coming. Dr. Hillyard had assured her that she was normal in every respect-"is eompletely normal a woman as I haw iver seen," she put it-and should have no complications. Moreover, Mary had obtained from her doctor a detailed deseription of what lay before her, and had read one or two hard213 books on the subject, so that she was spared the fearful imaginings and reliance on ohd wives' tales which are the results of the ancient poliey of surrounding normal functions with mystery.

214  THE NEST-BUILDER

Now the nurse was here, a tall, grave-eyed Canadian girl, quiet of speech, silent in every movement. Mary had wondered if she ouglit to go into Dr. Hillyard's hospital, and was infinitely relieved to have her assurance that it was unnecessary. She wanted her baby to be born here in the country, in the sweet place she lad prepared for it, surrounded by those she loved. Fverything here was perfect for the advent-she could ask for nothing more. True, she was seeking comparatively little of Stefan, but she knew he was busily painting, and he was uniformly kind and affectionate when they were together. He lad not been to town for over two months.

Mrs. Farraday was a frequent caller, and Mary had grown sineerely to love the sweet-faced old lady, who would drive up in a low pony chaise, bringing offerings of fruit and vegetables, or guaint preserves from reeipes unknown to Mary, which had been put up under her own direction.

Then, too, MeEwan would appear at week-ends or in the evening, tramping down the lane to hail the house in ahsurd varicties of the latest New York slang, whieh never failed to amuse Mary. The shy Janie was often with her; they were now the most intimate of friends. He would show her primitive tools and mechanical contrivances of his own making, and she would tell him stories of Scotland, of Prince Charlie and Flora, of Bruce and Wallace, of Bannoekburn, or of James, the poet king. Of these she had a store, having been brought up, as many English girls happily are, on the history and legends of the ishand, rather than on less robust fuminine fare.

Farraday, too, sometimes dropped in in the evening, to sit on the porcl with Stefan and Mary and talk quietly of books and the like. Oecasionally he eame with IIcEwan or Jamie; he never came alone-though this she had not notieed-at hours when Stefan was unlikely to be with lier.

At the suggestion of Mus. Farraday, whose word was the social law of the district, the most charming women in the neighborhood had called on Mary, so that her circle of acquaintances was now ruite wide. She had had in addition several visits from Constance, and the Sparrow had spent a week-end with them, chirping admiration of the place and encomiums of her friend's housekeeping. But Mary liked best to be with Stefan, or to dream alone through the hushed, sunlit hours ami'? her small tasks of house and garden. Now that the nurse was here, oceupying the little becuroom opening from Mary's room, the final preparations had been made; there was nothing left to do but wait.

Miss MeCullock had been with them three days, and Stefan had become used to her quict presence, when late one evening eertain small symptoms told her that Mary's time had come. Stefan, entering the lall, found her at the telephone. "Dr. Hillyard will be here in about an hour and a quarter," she said quietly, hanging up the receiver. "Do you know if she has driven out before? If not, it might he well for yon, Mr. Byrd, to walk to the foot of the lane soon, and be ready to signal the turning to her." Miss MeCullock always distrusted the

216

 THE NEST-BUILDERnerves of lmsbands on these oeeasions, and plamed adroitly to get them out of the way.

Stefan stared at her as flabberested as if this emergeney had not been homrly expesta.d. "Do yon mean," he grasped, "that Mary is ill?"
"She is not ill, Mr. IByrd, but the baby will probally be born before morning."
"My God!'" said Stefam, suddenly blanching. He had not faced this moment, had not thonght about it. had indeed hardly thought ahout Mary's motherhood at all except to deplore its toll upon her bodily beauty. Ile had tried for her sake, harder than she knew, to appear sympathetie, but in his heart the whole thing presented itself as nature's grotesque price for the early rapture of their love. That the price might be tragic as well as grotesque had only now eome home to him. He dropped on a chair. his memory flying back to the one other such event in which he had had part. He saw himself thrnst from his mother's door-he heard her shrieks-felt himself fly again into the rain. His forehead was wet; cold tingles ran to his fingertips.

The nurse's voice sounded, calm and pleasant, above him. A whiff of brandy met his nostrils. "You'd better drink this, Mr. Byrd, and then in a minute you might go and see Mrs. Byrd. You will feel better after that, I think.'

He drank, then looked up, haggard.
"They'll give her plenty of choroform, won't they?" he whispered, catehing the nurse's hand. She smiled reassuringly. "Don't worry, Mr. Byrd, your wife is in splendid condition, and ether will certainly be given when it becomes advisable."

The brandy was working now and his nerves had steadied, but he fomd the nurse's mamer mahdeningly cahn. "I'll go to Mare," he muttored, and, brushing past her, sprang up the stairs.

What he expected to see he did not know, hut his hemet pomuded as he opened the bedrom doot. 'Tlar room was beight with lamplight, and in spotless ordar. 't her small writing-table sat Mary, in a loose white dressing gown, her hair in smooth braids aromm her head. writing. What was she doing? Was she leaving some last message for him, in case-? He folt himself grow cold again. "Mary!" he exclaimed hoarsely.

She looked round, and called joyfully to him.
"Oh, darling, there you are. I'm gething everything ready. It's coming, Stefan dearest. I'min so happu!" Her face was excited, radiant.

He ran to her with a groan of relief. and, kne ling, amblat her face to his. "Oh, Beantiful, yom 're all right then? She told me-I was afraid-" he stmmbed, inarticulate.

She stroked his eheck comfortingly. "Dearest, isn 't it wonderful-jnst think-by to-morrow onr haby will be here." She kissed him, between happy tears and langhter.
"Yon are not in pain, darling? You're all right? What were you writing when I came in?" he stammered, anxiously.
"I'm putting all the accounts straight, and paying all the bills to date, so that Lily won't have any trouble while I'm laid up,'" she beamed.

Stefan stared uncomprelendingly for a moment, then linrst into half-hysterical laughter.

218 TIIE NEST-BUILDER

"Oht, you marvel," he gasperl, "godless of efficieney, mushakable Olympian! Bills! And I thought you were writing me a fartwell message."
"silly hoy," she replien. "The bills have got to be paid; a niee mudde som wonld be in if you had them to de yonsself. But, warest-" her face grew suddenly frave and she took his haml--"listen. I have written yon something-it is there-" hor fingers touehed ant dastie lommel pile of papors. "I'm perfectly well, but if anything should happen, I want my sister to have the halle゙. l'ecimse I think, dear-"' she stroked his hand with a look of compassionate understanding-" that without me yon would not want it very much. Miss Mason would take it to England for you, and you conld make my sister an allowance. I've left you her address, and "ll that [ cim think of to suggest."

He gazed at her dumbly. Her face glowed with life and beanty, her voice wats sweet and steady. There she sat. utterly mistress of horself, in the shatow of life and death. Wis it that her imarimation was tramseendent, or that she had nome? IIe did not know, he did not moleritand lere, but in that momer could have said his pravers at her feet.

The musse chtered. "Now, Mr. Byrd, I think if you could go to the end of the lane and be louking ont for the doctor? Nrs. Burd onght to have her bath."

Stefan departed. In a dream he walked to the lane's end and waited there. Te was thinking of Mary, perhaps for the first time, not as a beautiful object of love and inspiration, nor as his companion, but as a woman. What was this calm strength, this certitude of hers? Why did her every word and act seem to move straight forward, while his wheled and eireled? What was it that Mary had that he had not? Of what was heve in. most fiber math? It rame to him that for all thone foving passages his wife was a strange to him, and a stranger whom he had never songht to know. He felt ashamed.

It was about eleven obelock when the distame was pricked by two points of light, which, grathally expanting, proved to be the headtamps of the doetor's ear. She stopped at his hat and he climbed beside her.
"I'm glad you came, though I think I know the turning," satid Dr. Hillyard cheerfully.
"How long will it be, doctor"" he asked nervously.
"Feerling jumpy?" she replied. "Boterer het me give yon a bromide, and try for a little shep. Don't you worry-unless we have complications it will be over lo. fore morning."
"Before morning!"' he groaned. "Doctor, yon won't let her suffer-you will give her somothing?"

He was again reassured. "Ce, mly. But she has a magnifieent physirqe, with museres which have never been allowed to soften throngh tiefit elothing or lack of exercise. I expect an easy case. Here we are, I think." The swift little car stopped acemately at the gate, and the doctor, shatting off her power, was ont in a moment, bage in hand. The murse met them in the hall.
"Getting on nicely-an casy first stage," she reported. The two women disappeared upstairs, and Stefan was left alone to live through as best he could the most diai.ult hours that fall to the int of civilized man. Prescutly Miss MeCullock came down to him with a powder, and advice from the doctor anent bed, but he would tatio neither the one num the other. "What a sot I shonlat be," he thonght, pieturing himself lying draseng to shmber white Mary suffered. from the bathoom, brilliant light was remphlow, two move with ineredibue sperd amid a perfertly ordered (hatos. All Xary's protty paraphomalia were gome; covered hy immandable ohjoets soaled in stifi paper. Amid these ation smromelings Mary sat in her nightgown on the were of the bed, lew kite drawn up.
"Hello, hearest." stae callon bather ex"itedy, "we re getting awfully bise:" Then her face rontratere "Here comes another," she said cherrile, and gasped a little. On that Stefim fled, with a mattered "call me if slie wants me," to the marse.

He wandered to the kithen. There was a roaring fire, but the room was empty-even Lily had fomm work upstairs. For an hour more Stefan prowled-then he rang up the Farraday's honse. After an interval James' voice answered him.
"It's Byrl, Farraday," said Stefan. "No--" quickl--"everything's perfectly all right, perfectly, but it 's going on. Could you come over?"

In fifteen minutes Farratay har? dressed and was at the door, his great ear rliding up sitently beside the doetor's. As he walked in Stefan saw that his face was quite white.
"It was awfully grond of you to come," he said.
"I'm so glad you asked me. My car is a sixty horse. power, if anything were needed." Farraday sat down, and lighted a pipe. Stefon delivered knowledge of the wating machime upstairs, amd then rewnmmenoml his prowl. liank and forth thromsh the two liviner romens ho pipe dropped on the hathe, Stofan fore whatios "What is it?" he asked at the opern deore Somethinis larere and white moved pewer?nlly on the bed. It the foot bent the little dowtor, here hamks hihhen, and at tla, head stood the murse holding a small ram. A horay. sweet odor filled the roum.

"It"s all right," the doctor said rapidly. "Eypmbico stage. She isn "t suffering."
"Hello, Stefan dear." said a small, rather high rame. which mate him jmmp riokently. Then he saw at fare om the pillow, its eyes closed, and its mose and month wownol with a wire come. In a moment there came a malsp, the sheathed form trew tense, the nurse spilled a fow drops from her can upon the eome, the growhine pocommentard and heightmod to a crescomdo. Stofan had an inpres. sion of tremendons physical life, but the haman tone of the "Hello, Stufem," was rulte rome again.

He was backing shakily out when the doctor called to him.
"It will be born quite soon, now, Mr. Byrd," her cheery roice promised.

Trembling with relief, he stumbled downstairs. Farraday was standing rigid before the firephace, his face quite captosionless.

THE NEST-BUILDER

"She's having ether-I don't think she's suffering. The doctor says quite soon, now," Stefan jerked out.
"I'm thankful," said Farraday, quietly.
He stooped and picked up his fallen pipe, but it took him a long time to refill it-particles of tobaceo kept showering to the rug from his fingers. Siefan, with a new eigarette, resumed his prowl.

Midsummer dawn was breaking. The lamplight hegan to pale before the glimmer of the windows. A sleepy bird chirped, the room became mysterious.

There had been rapid steps overhead for some moments, and now the two men became aware that the tigerlike sounds had quite ceased. The steps overhead quicted. Farraday put out the lamp, and the blue light flooded the room.

A birci called loudly, and another answered it, high, repeatedly. The notes were right over their heads; they rose higlier, insistent. They were not the notes of a bird. The nurse appeared at the door and looked at Stefan.
"Your son is born," she said.
Instantly to both men it was as if eeric bonds, drawn over-taut, had suapped, releasing them again to the physieal world about them. The high mystery was over; life was human and kindly onee again. Farraday dropped into his chair and held a hand across his eyes. Stefan threw both arms round Miss MeCulloek's shoulders and hugged her like a ehild.
"Oh, hurrah!" he cried, almost sobbing with relief. "Bless you, nurse. Is she all right?"
"She's perfeet-I've never seen finer eondition. You can come up in a few minutes, the doctor says, and see her before she goes to sleep."
"There's nothing needed, nurse?" asked Farraday, rising.
"Nothing at all, thank you."
"Then I'll be getting home, Byrd," he said, offering his hand to Stefan. "Dly warmest congratulations. Let me know if there's anything I can do."

Stefan shook the proftered hamd with a derepe liking than he had yet felt for this silent mam.
"I'm everlastingly grateful to you, Fartaday, for helping me ont, and Mary will be, too. I don't know how I eonld have stood it alone."

Stefan mounted the stairs tremblingly, to pause in amazement at the door of Mary's room. A second transformation had, as if by magie, taken place. The lights were out. The dawn smiled at the windows, through whieh a gentle brecze ruffled the curtains. Gone were all evidences of the night's tense drama; talhes and chairs were empty; the room looked calm and spacious.

On the bed Mary lay quiet, her form hardly outlined under the smooth coverlet. IIalf fearfully he let his eves travel to the pillow, dreading he knew not what ehange. Instantly, relief overwhelmed him. Ifer face was radiant, her cheeks pink-she seemed to glow with a sublimated happiness. Only in her eyes lay any traces of the night-they were still heary from the anasthetie, but they shone lovingly on him, as though deep lights were behind them.
"Darling," she whispered, "we've got a little boy. Did you worry? It wasn't anything-only the most thrilling adventure that's ever happened to me."

He looked at her ahmost with awe-then, stooping, pressed his face to the pillow beside hers.

224 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Were they mereiful to you, Beautiful?" he whispered back. Weakly, her hand found his head.
"Yes, darling, they were wonderful. I was never quite uncouseious, yet it wasu't a bit bad-only as if I were in the hands of some prodig:ous force. They showed me the baby, too-just for a minute. I want to see him again now-with you."

Stefan looked up. Dr. Hillyard was in the doorway of the little room. She nodded, and in a moment reappeared, earrying a small white bundle.
"IIere he is," she said; "he weighs eight and a half pounds. You can both look at him for a moment, and then Mrs. Byrd must go to sleep." She put the bundle gently down beside Mary, whose head turned toward it.

Almost hidden in folds of flamel Stefan saw a tiny red face, its eyes elused, two mieroseopie fists doubled under its chin. It eonveyed nothing to him except a sense of amazement.
"IIe's askeep," whispered Mary, "but I saw his eyesthey are blue. Isn't he pretty?" Her own eyes, soft with adoration, turned from her son to Stefan. Then they drooped, drowsily.
"She's falling off," said the doctor under her breath, recovering the baby. "They'll both slecp for several hours now. Lily is getting us some breakfast-wouldn't you like some, too, Mr. Byrd?"

Stefan felt grateful for her normal, cheery manner, and for Mary's sudden drowsiness; they seemed to cover what he felt to be a failure in himself. IIe lad been unable to find one word to say about the baby.

At breakfast, served by the sleepy but beaming Lily, Stefan was dazed by the bearing of doctor and nurse. These two women, after a night spent in work of an intensity and seope beyond his powers to gage, appeared as fresh and normal as if they had just risen from sleep, while he, unshaved and rumpled, eould barely control his racked nerves and heavy head, across whieh doctor and nurse diseussed their case with animation.
"We are all going to bed, Mr. Byrd," said the doetor at last, noting his exhausted aspeet. "I shall get two or three hours' nap on the sofa before going back to town, and I hope you will take a thorough rest."

Stefan rose rather dizzily from his unfinished meal.
"Please take my room," he said, "I eouldn't stay in the house-I'm going out." IIe found the atmosphere of alert efficieney created by these women utterly insupportable. The house stifled him with its tecming feminine life. In the felt superfluous, futile. Ifurrying out, he stumbled down the slope and, stripping, dived into the water. Its cold touch robbed him of thought; he became at onee merely one of Nature's straying children returned again to her arms.

Swimming baek, he drew on his clothes, and mounting to the garden, threw himself faee down upon the grass, and fell asleep under the morning sun.

He dreamed that a drum was ealling him. Its beat, muffled and irregular, yet urged him forward. A flag waved dazzlingly before his eyes; its folds stifled him. He tried to move, yet could not-the drum ealled ever more urgently. He started awake, to find himself on his baek, the sun beating into his face, and the doctor's machine chugging down the lane.

VII

TIIE little June baby at the Byrdsnest was very popular with the neighborhood. During the summer it seemed to Stefan that the house was never free of visitors who came to admire the child, guess his weight, and exclaim at his mother's health.

As a eonvalesecht, Mary was, according to Constance Elliot, a eomplete frand. Except for her lair, which had temporarily lost some of its elasticity, she had never looked so radiant. She was out of bed on the ninth day, and walking in the garden on the twelfth. The behavior of the baby-who was a stranger to artifieial food -was exemplary; he never fretted, and eried only when he was hungry. But as bis appetite troubled him every three hours during the day, and every four at night, he appeared to Stefan to ery ineessantly, and his strenuous wail wrould drive his father from house to barn, and from barn to woods. Lured from one of these retreats by an interval of silence, Stefan was as likely as not to find an auto at the gate and hear exelamatory voices proceeding from the nursery, when he would fade into the woods agrain like a wild thing fearful of the trap.

Ilis old dislike of his kind reasserted itself. It is one thing to be surrounded by pretty women proclaiming you the greatest artist of your day, and guite another to listen while they exclaim on the perfections of your offspring and the health of your wife. For the first type of conversation Stefin had still an appetite; with the second he was (quickly surfeited.

Nor were women his only tormentors. 'lhe baby spent mueh of its time in the giarden, and every Sunday Stefin would find Mcewan planted on the lawn, prodding the infant with a huge foretinger, and exploding into fatnous mirth whenever he deluded himself into berfeving he had made it smile. Of late Stefam hat berm to tolerate this man, but alfer three such exhibitions decided to harkhist him permanently as an insuthorable idiot. Even Firraday lost gromul in his esterm, for, though guity of no banalities, he ham a way of silently howering over the baby-arriage which stefan found mesteriously irritating. Jamic alone of their mastaline frismols secmed to adopt a comprehensible attitude, for he backed away in hasty alarm whenever the infant, in arms or carriage, bore down upon him. On several occasions when the Farraday household invarded the Byrdsurst Stefinn and Jamie together sneaked away in seareh of an environment more seemly for their sex.
"You are the only creature I know jnst now, Janie," Stefan said, "with any sense of proportion;" and these two outeasts from notice wonld tramp moodily throngh the woorls, the boy faithfully imitating Stefan's sloweh and his despondent way of carrying his hands thrust in his porkets.

There were no more tales of Scotland for Jamic in these days, and as for Stefan he hardly saiw his wife. True, she always brightened when he eane in and mutely evinced her desire that he should remain, hut she was never his. While he talked her eye would wander to the cradle, or if they were in another room her ear would be constantly strained to eatch a cry. In the midst of a pleasant interlude she would jump to her feet with a marmuried "l)inner time," or "Ite must have some water now," and be gone.

228

Stefim did not sleep with her-as he eould not endure being distmbed at night-and she took a bong map evory afternoon, so that at best the homs a arilable for him were few. Any visitor, he thonght morosely, won more attention from her than he did, and this was in a sense true, for the visitors openly admired the baby-the heart of Mary's life-and he did not.

IIe did not know how intensely she longed for this, how she ached to see Stefam jab his finger at the baby as MeEwan did, or watch it with the tender smile of Farralay. She tried a thousand simple wiles to bring to life the father in him. Abont to nurse the baby, she would eall Stefan to see his eager searel for the eomfort of her lireast, looking up in proud joy as the tiny mouth was satisfied.

At the very first, when the baby was newborn, Stefan had watehed this rite with some interest, but now he only fidgeted, exelaiming, "You are looking wonderfully fit, Mary," or "Greedy little beggar, isn't he?" IIe never spoke of his old idea of painting her as a Madonna. If she drew his attention to the baby's tiny hands or feet, he would glance carelessly at them, with a "They're all right," or "I'll like them better when they're brgger.'

Once, as they were going to bed, she showed Stefan the baby lying on his ehest, one fist balled on either side of the pillow, the downy back of his head shining in the candle-light. She stooped and kissed it.
"IIis head is too deliciously soft and warm, Stefan; do kiss it good-night."

His face contracted into all expression of distaste. "No," he said, "I ean't kiss babies," and left the room.

She felt terribly, unnecessarily hurt. It was so difficult for her to make advanees, so fatally easy for him to rebuff them.

After that, she did not draw the baby to his attention again.

Perhaps, had the ehild been a girl, Stefan would have felt more sentiment about it. 1 girl baby, lying like a pink bud anong the roses of the garlen, might have appealed to that elfin imagination which larogly took the place in him of romance-but a boy! A boy was merely in his cyes another male, and Stefan considered the world far too full of men already.

He sealed his attitude when the question of the child's name came up. Mary had fallen into a lahit of calling it "Little Stefan," or "Steve" for short, and one morning, as the older Stefan crossed the lawn to his studio her voice floated down from the nursery in an improvised song to her "Stefan Baby." He bounded upstairs to her.
"Mary," he called, "you are surely not going to call that infant by my name?"

Mary, her lap enveloped in aprons and towels, looked up from the bath in which her son was practising tentative kieks.
"Why, yes, dear, I thought we'd christen him after you, as he's the eldest. Don't you think that would be nice?'" She looked puzzled.
"No, I do not!" Stefan snorted emphatically. "For heaven's sake give the child a name of his own, and let me keep mine. My God, one Stefan Byrd is enough in the world, I should think!"

THE NEST-BUILDER

"Well, dear, what shall we call him, then ${ }^{\text {o" }}$ she asked, lowering her head over the baby to hide her hurt.
"Give him your own name if yon want to. After all, he's your chihd. Elliston Byrd wouldn't sound at all bad."
"Very well," said Mary slowly. "I think the Dad would have been pleased by that." In spite of herself, her voice trembled.
"Good Lord. Mary, I haven't hurt you, have I?" IIe looked exasperated.

She shook her head, still bending over the baby.
"It's all right, dear"," she whispered.
"You're so soltt nowadays, one hardly dare speak," he muttered. "Sorry, dear," and with a penitent kiss for" the baek of her neck he hastened downstairs again.

The christening was held two weeks later, in the small Episeopalian church of Crab's Bay. Stefan could see 110 reason for it, as neither he nor Mary was orthodox, but when he sugrested omitting the eeremony she looked at him wide-eyed.
"Not christen him, Stefan? Oh, I don't think that would be fair," she said. Her mamer wats simple, but there was finality in her toue-it made him feel that wherever her child was coneerued she would be adamant.

The baly's godmother was, of course, Constance, and his godfathers, equally obvionsly, Farcaday and McEwan. Mary made the ceremony the oceasion of a small at-home, inviting the numerous friends from whom she had received congratulations or gifts for the baby.

Miss Mason had insisted on herself biking the christening cake; Farraday as usual supplied a sheaf of flowers. In the drawing room the little Elliston's presents were displayed, a beatiful old cup from Farraday, a christening robe, and a spoon, "pusher"," and fork from Constance, a silver howl "For Elliston's porritge from his friond Wallace MeEwan," and a Bible in stont leather binding from Mrs. Farraday, inseribed in her delicate, slanting hand. There was even a napkin ring from the baby's annt in England, who was much relieved that her too-independent sister had marriod a sucerssful artist and done her duty by the fanily so promptly.

Mary was naïvely delighted with these offerings.
"He has got everything I should have liked him to have!" she exclaimed as she arranged them.

Stefan, led to the font, showed all the nerronsness he had omitted at the altar, but looked very hamesome in a suit of linen crash, while Mary, in white muslin, was at her glowing best.

Constance was inevitably late, for, like most American women, she did not earry her modeniable efficieney to the point of punctuality. At the last moment, howerer, she dashed up to the church with the chan of a trinmphant general, bearing her hashamd eaptive in the tonnean, and no less a person than Gunther, the distinguished seulptor, on the scat beside her.
 thought he onesit to be here," she whis, ered ineonsequentially to 11 iry after the ceremony.

Of their man, acquaintances fow were unrepresented except Miss Bever, to whom Mary had felt disinclined to send an inviration. She had sounded Stefan on the subject, but had been answered by a "Certainly not!" so emphatic as to surprise her.

At the homse Gunther, with his great heisht and magnificent viking head, was mquestionally the hit of the afternoon. Holding the baby, which lay confidently in his powerful hands, he examined its head, arms and legs with professional interest, whil every woman in the room watched him admiringly,

232  THE NES'I'-BULLDER

"This baby, Mrs. Byrd, is the finest for his are I have ever seen, and I have modeled many of them," he pronommed, hambing it back to Aary, who bushed to how forchead with pleasare. "Not that I am smrprised," he went on, staring framky at her. "When I look at his mother. I am doing some groups for the l'an-Americm exhibition next year in San Franciseo. If you conld give me any time, I should very mudh like to use yom head and the baby's. I shall try and arrange it with yom," and he nowded as if that settled the matter.
"Oh," gasped Constanee, "you have all the hack, Mary! Mr. Gunther has known me for years. but have $I$ had a chance to sit for him? I feel myself turning green, and as my gown is yellow it will be most unbecoming!" And scizing Farraday as if for eonsolation, she bore him to the dining room to find a drink.

Stefan, who was interested in Gunther, tried to get him to the barn to see his pictures; but the sculptor would not move i eyes from Mary, and Stefan, considerably bored, as obliged to content himself with showing the stua.s to some of his prettiest neighbors.

Nor did his spirits improve when the party came to an end.
"Bon Dieu!" he cried, flinging limself fretfully into a chair. "Is our house never to be free of chattering women? The only person here to-day who speaks my language was Gunther, and you never gave me a chance at him."

Mary gasped, too astonished at this aceusation to refute it.
"Ever since we eame down here," he went on irritably, "the place has secthed with people, and owerflowerd with domesticity. I never hear one word spoknon except on the subject of furniture, gardening ant babis's! I can't work in such an enviromment; it stifles all imargination. As for yon, Mary-"

IIe looked up at her. She was standing, strickell motionless, in the centur of the room. Her hair, straighter than of old, serimel to droop over her ears; her form minder its loose muslin dress showed soft and bharred, its clean-eut lines gone, while her face, almost as white as the gown, was woe-begone, the eyes dark with tears. She stood there like a hurt child, all her comrageotes gallantry eclipsed by this unkind ending to her happy day. Stefan rose to his feet and faced her, searching for some phrase that could express his sense of deprivation. He had the instinet to stab her into a full realization of what she was losing in his eyes.
"Mary," he eried almost wildly, "your wings are gone!'" and rushed out of the room.

PART IV
WINGS

I

ONE evening early in October Mary telephoned Farraday to ask if she could eonsult him with reference to the Byrdsnest. He walked over after dinner, to find her alone in the sitting room, eompanioned by a wood fire and the two sleeping lovebirds.

James had been very busy at the office for some time, and it was two or three weeks sinee he had seen Mary. Now, as he sat opposite her, it seemed to him that the leaping firelight showed unaeeustomed shadows in her eheeks and under her eyes, and that her eolor was less bright than formerly. Was it merely the result of her eare of her baby, he wondered, or was there something more?
"I fear we've already outstayed our time here, Mr. Farraday," Mary was saying, "and yet I am going to ask you for an extension."

Farraday lit a eigarette.
"My dear Mrs. Byrd, stay as long as you like."
"But you don't know the measure of my demands," she went on, with a hesitating smile. "They are so extensive that I'm ashamed. I love this little plaee, Mr. Farraday; it's the first real home I've ever had of my own. And Baby does so splendidly here-I ean't bear the thought of taking him to the eity. How long might I really hope to stay without ineonvenieneing you? I mean, of eourse, at a proper rent."
"As far as I am eoncerned." he smiled baek at her, "I shall be overjoyed to have yon stay as loner as the place attracts you. If you like, 1 will give you a lease-a year, two, or three, as you will, so that you could feel settled, or an option to renew after the first year."

238

THE NEST-BUILDER

"But, Mr. Farralas, yomr mother told me that you used to mse the place, and in the fare of that I don't know how I have the selfishuess to ask you for any time at all, to say nothing of a lease!"
"Mrs. Byrd." Farraday threw his cigarette into the fire, and, leaning forward, stared at the flames, his hands clasped between his knees. "Let me tell you a sentimental little story, which no one else knows except our friend Mae." He smiled whimsically.
"When I was a young man I was very much in love, and looked forward to having a home of my own, and ehildren. But I was minfortunate-l did not sneceed in winning the woman I loved, and as I am slow to change, I made up my mind that my dream home wonld never come true. But I was very fond of my 'eottage in the air,' and some years later, when this little house became empty, I arranged it to look as nearly as I could as that other might have done. I used to sit here sometimes and pretend that my shadows were real. You will langh at me, but I even have in my desk plans for an addition, an cll, eontaining a play room and nurseries."

Mary gave a little pitiful exelamation, and touched his clasped hands. Mecting her eyes, he saw them dewy with sympathy.
"You are very gracious to a sentimental old bachelor," he said, with his wiming smile. "But these ghosts were bad for me. I was in danger of beeoming absurdly seli-centered, almost morbidly introspective. Mac, whose heart is the biggest I know, and who laughs away more troubles than I ever dreamed of, rallied me about it, and showed me that I ought to turn my disappointment to some nse. This was about ten years ago, when his own life fell to pieces. I had been associated with magazines for some time, and linew how little that was really good found its way into the plainer people's homes. At Mac's suggestion I bought an insolvent monthly, and begin to remodel it. 'You've rot the home-and-chitdren bug; well, do something for other people's'-was the way Mac put it to me. Lator we started the two other magazines, always keeping lefore us our aim of giving the average home the best there is. To-day, though I have no children of my own, I like to think I'm a sort of unele to thonsands."

He leant back, still staring into the fire. There was silence for a minute; a log fell with a crash and a flight of sparks-Farraday replaced it.
"Well, Mrs. Byrd," he went on, "all this time the little ghost-house stood empty. No one used it but myself. It was made for a woman and for children, yet in my selfishness I loeked its door against those who should rightfully have enjoyed it. Mac urged me to use it as a holiday house for poor mothers from the eity, but, somehow, I could not bring myself to evict its dreanmistress."
"Oh, I feel more than ever a trespasser!" exclaimed Mary.

He shook his head. "No, you lave redermed the place from futility-you are its justification." IIe paused again, and contimued in a lower tone, "Mrs. Byrd, you won't mind my saying this-you are so like that lady of long ago that the house seems yours by natural right. I think I was only waiting for someone who would love and understand it-some golden-haired young mother, like yourself, to give the key to. I ean 't tell you how happy it makes me that the little house should at last fulfil itself. Please keep it for as long as you need itit will always need you.'•

240 TIIE NEST-BUILDER

Mary was much moved: "I ean't thank you, Mr. Farraday, but I feel deeply honored. Perhaps my best thanks lie just in loving the house, and I do that, with all my heart. You don't mind my foolish little name for it?"
"The Byrdsnest? I think it perfeet."
"And you don't mind either the alterations I have made?"
"My dear friend, while you keep this house I want it to be yours. Should you wish to take a long lease, and enlarge it, I shall be happy. In faet. I will sell it to you, if in the future you would eare to buy. My only stipulation would be an option to repurchase sloould you decide to give it up." He took her hand. "The Byrdsnest belongs to Elliston's mother ; let us both understand that."

Her lips trembled. "You are good to me."
"No, it is you who are good to the dreams of a sentimentalist. And now-" he sat back smilingly-"that is settled. Tell me the new's. How is my godson, how is Mr. Byrd, how fares the sable Lily ?"
"Baby weighs fourteen and a half pounds," she said proudly; "he is simply perfect. Lily is an angel." She paused, and seemed to eontinue almost with an effort. "Stefan is very busy. IIe does not eare to paint autumn landscapes, so he has begum work again in the city. He's doing a fantastic study of Miss Berber, and is very much pleased with it."
"That's good," said Farraday, evenly.
"But I've got more news for you," she went on, brightening. "I've had a good deal more time lately, Stefan being so much in town, and Baby's habits so regular. Here's the result."

She fetched from the desk a pile of manuseript, neatly penned, and laid it on her guest's knee.
"'This is the second thing I wanted to consult you ahout. It's a book-length story for ehildren, called 'The House in the Wood.' I've written the first third, and outlined the rest. Here's the list of chapters. It is supposed to be for ehildren between eight and fourteen, and was first suggested to me by this house. There is a family of four children, and a regulation father and mother, unrse, governess, and grandmother. They live in the country, and the ehildren find a little deserted eottage which they adopt to play in. The book is full of their adventures in it. My idea is-" she sat beside him, her eyes brightening with interest-"to suggest all kinds of games to the children who read the story, which seem thrilling, hut are really educational. It's quite a moral little book, I'm afraid," she laughed, "but I think story books should deseribe adventures whieh may be within the seope of the ordinary child's life, don't you? I'm afraid it isn't a work of art, but I hope-if I can work out the scheme-it may give som practical ideas to mothers who don't know how to amuse their children. . . . There, Mr. Editor, what is your verdiet?"

Farraday was turning the pages in his rapid, absorbed way. He nodded and smiled as he looked.
"I think it's a good idea, Mrs. Byrd; just the sort of thing we are always on the lookout for. The subject might be trite enough, but I suspect you of having lent it charm and freshness. Of eourse the family is English, which is a disadvantage, but I see you've mixed in a small American visitor, and that he's begimning to teach the others a thing or two! Where did you learn sueh serpent wisdom, young lady?"

242

THE NEST-BUILDER

She laughed, amazed as she had been a year ago at his lig!.tning-like apprehension.
' It isn't lhmbug. I do think an American ehild eould teach ours at home a lot about inventiveness, independence, and democracy-just as I think ours might teach him something about manners," she added, smiling.
"Admitted," said he, laying down the manuseript, "and thank you for letting we see this. I elaim the first refusal. Finish it, have it typed, and send it in, and if I ean run it as a serial in The Child at Home, I shall be tremendonsly pleased to do so. If it goce, it ought to eome out in book furm, illustrated."
"You really think the idea inas something in it?"
"I eertainly do, and you know how mueh I believe in your work."
"Oh, I'm so glad," she exclaimed, looking far more cheerful than he had seen her that evening.

He rose to go, and held her hand a moment in his friendly grasp.
"Good night, dear Mrs. Byrd; give my love to Elliston, and remember that in him and your work you have two prieeless treasures which, even alone, will give you happiness."
"Oh, I know," she said, her eyes shining; "good night, and thank you for the house."
"Good night, and in the house's name, thank you," he answered from the door.

As she closed it, the bitightness showly faded from Mary's face. She looked at the elock-it was past tcn.
"Not to-night, either," she said to herself. IIer hand wandered to the teleplime in the hall, but she drew it back. "No, better not," she thought, and, puttinis ont the lights, walked resolntely upstairs. Ac, candle in hand, she passed the door of Stefan's room, she lookerd in. Itis bed was smootl! a few trifles lay in orderly array upon his dressing table: boots, from which the country dust had been wiped days ago, stood with tors turned meekly to the wall. They looked lonely, she thonght.

With a sigh, she entered her own room, and passed through it to the nursery. There lay her baby, somndly sleeping, his cheek on the pillow, his little fists folded under his elin. How beantiful he looked, she thonght; how sweet his little room, how fresh and peateful all the honse! It was the home of love-love lay all about her, in the kind protection of the trees, in the nests of the squirrels, in the voices and faces of her friends, and in her heart. Love was all about her, and the sweetness of young life-and she was utterly lonely. One short year ago she thought she would never know loneliness again -ouly a year ago.

The candle wavered in her hand; a drop of wax fell on the baby's spotless eoverlet. Stonping, she blew upon it till it was cold, and earefnlly broke it off. She sat down in a low rocking chair, and lifting the baby, gave him his good-night mursing. IIe barely opened his sleepladen eyes. She kissed him, made him tidy for the night, and laid him down, waiting while he cuddled luxurionsly back to sleep.

244 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Little Stefan, little Stefan," she whispered.
Then, leaving the nursery door ajar, she undressed noiselessly, and lay duwn on the cool, empty bed.

II

T
HE following afternoon about teatime Stefan bicycled up from the station. Mary, who was in the sitting room, heard him calling from the gate, but did not go to meet him. He linrried into the room and kissed her half-turned cheek effusively.
"Well, dear, aren't you glad to see me?"' he asked rather nervousiy.
"Do you know that you've been away six days, Stefan, and have only troubled te telephone me twiee?" she answered, in a voice earefully controlled.
"You don't mean it!'" he exclaimed. "I had no idea it was so long."
"IIadn't you?"
He fidgeted. 'Well, dear, you know I'm frightfully keen on this new picture, and the journeys back and forth waste so mueh time. But as for the telephoning, I'm awfully sorry. I've been so absorbed I simply didn't remember. Why didn't you ring me up?"
"I didn't wish to interrupt a sitting. I rang twice in the evenings, but you were out."
"Yes; I've been trying to amuse myself a little." He was roeking from one foot to the other like a deteeted schoolboy.
"Hang it all, Mary,' he burst out, "don't be so judicial. One must have some pleasure-I can't sit about this eottage all the time."
"I don't think I've asked you to do that."

246 THE NEST-BULLDER

"You haven't, but you seem to be implying the request now."

She was chilled to silenee, having no heart to reason him out of so unmensonable a defense.
"Well, anyway," he said, flinging himself on the sofa, "hore I im, so let's make the best of it. 'Tea ready?"
"It's just coming."
"That's grood. When are you coming up to see the pieture? It's going to be the best I've done. I shall get Constantine to exhibit it and that stick of a Demeter together, and then the real people and the fools will both have something to arluire."
"You say this will be your best?" asked Mary, whom the phrase had stabbed.
"Well," he said reflectively, lighting a eigarette, "perhaps not better than the Danaio in one sense-it hasn't as much feeling, but has more originality. Miss Berber is such an unusual type-she's quite an inspiration."
"And I'm not, any more," Nary could not help adding in a muffled roice.
"Don't be so literal, my dear; of course you are, but not for this sort of picture." The assuranee somnded perfunctory.
"Thank goodness, here comes the tea," he exelaimed as Lily entered with the tray. "Iullo, Lily; how goes it?"
"Fine, Mr. Byrd, but we've shorely missed you," she answered, with something less than her usual wholehearted smile.
"Well, you must rejoice, now that the prodigal has returned," he grimed. "Mary, you haven't answered my question yet-when are you coming in to see the picture? Why not to-morrow? I'm lying to show it to you."

She flushed. "I can't come, Stefan ; it's impossible to leave Baby so long."
"Well, bring him with you."
"That wouldn't be posisible, either; it would disturb his slecp, and upset him."
"There you are!" he exelaimed, rufling his hair. "I can't work down here, and you can't come to town-how can I help seeming to neglect you? Look here''-he had drunk his tea at a gulp, and now held out his eup for more-"if you're lonely, why not move back to the city-then you could keep your cye on me!" and he grinned again.

For some time Mary had feared this surgestion-she had not yet discussed with Stefim her desire to stay in the country. She pressed her hamds together nervously.
"Stefan, do you really want me to move back?"
"I want you to do whatever will make you happier," he temporized.
"If you really needed me there I would come. But you are always so absorbed when you're working, and 1 am so busy with Baby, that I don't belicere we should have rauch more time together than now."
"Neither do I," he agreed, in a tone suspicionsly like relief, which she was quick to eateh.
"On the other hand," she went on, "this place is far better for Baby, and I am devoted to it. We couldn't afford anything half as comfortable in the city, and you like it, too, in the summer."
"Of course I do," he an "red cheerfully. "I should hate to give it up, and I'm sure it's much more ceonomical, and all that. Still, if you stay here through the winter you mustn't be angry if I am in town part of the time-my work has got to come first, you know."

248

"Yes, of course, denr," said Mary, wistfully, "and I think it would be a mistake for me to come maless you really wanted me."
"Of course I want you, Beautiful."
ITe spoke easily, but she wiss not deeeived. She knew he was glad of the arrangement, not for her salie, but for his own. She had wateled him fretting for weeks past, like a caged bird, and she had the wistom to see that her only hope of making him desire the nest agrain lay in giving him freedom from it. Her prite fortified this pereeption. As she had said long ago, Mary was no bargainer.

In spite of her eomprehension, however, she warmed toward him. It was so good to see him lomoging on the sofa again, his grecn-gold eyes bright, his brown face with its elfish smile radiant now that his point was won. She knew he had been mokind to her both in word and act, but it was impossible not to forgive him, now that she enjoved again the comfort of his presence.

Smiling, she poured out his third cup of tea, and was just passing it when there was a knoek, and MeEwan entered the hall.
"Hello, Byrd," he ealled, his broad shonlders blocking the sitting room door as he eame in; "down among the Rubes again? Madam Mary, I accept in advance your offer of tea. Well, how goes the counterfeit presentment of our friend Twinkle-Toes?"

Stefan's eyebrows went up. "Do you mean Miss Berber?"
"Yes," said McEwan, with an aggravating smile, as he devoured a sliec of eake. "We're all expecting another ten-strike. Are you depicting her as a toe-shaker or a sartorial artist?"
"Really, Walliee," protested Mary, who nad grown quite intimate with Mc Ewan, "you alte htterly incorrifible in your Yamke vein--yon respert no ont",
"I respect the President of these l'uited states," salid he solemmly, rasing an inarinary hat.
"That's more than I do," shorted Stefian; " a pompons l'uritan!"
"Four groodness' sake, dont start him on politios. Wallace." sad Mary; "He has a contempt for evere pul)lic man in America except Roosevelt and bill Heywool."
"o [ have" pullid Stefan: "they are the onle two wit! a anan of cha pioturesque, or one iota of original$15:$
"Fon cheill to paint their pictures arm in arm, with Taft flontime on a clomd erowning them with a sombero and a samdbas, Bryan poming grape-jaz... ! 'hations, and Wilson watchfully waiting in the habls... ad. Lablel it 'Morituri salutamus'-I bet it wont? ? : ': MeEwan hopefully.

Mary langhed heartily, buts: boredom. "Why don"t yon $\xi$ " $\quad$ ". :. "2, McEwan?" he frowned.
'Solely out of consideration for it: ... : ars," MeEwan sighed, putting down his wis and rising. "Well, chin music hath chams, but I must torlfle to the honse, or I shall get in bad with Jamic. My love to Elliston, Mary. Byrd, I warn yon that my well-known eritical faculty needs stimulation; I mean to drop in at the studio ere long to slam the latest masterpiece. So long," and he grinned himself ont before Stefan's rising irritation had a chance to explode.
"Why do you let that great tomfool call you by your first name, Mary ?" he demanded, almost before the front door was shut.

250

THE NEST-BUILDER

"Wallace is one of the kindest men alive, and I'm quite devoted to him. I admit, though, that he seems to enjoy teasing yon."
"Teasing me!" Stefan scolled; "it's like an elephant teasing a fy. He obliterates me."
"Well, ron:t be an old crosspatch," she smiled, determined now they were alone again to make the most of him.
"You are a good sort, Mary," he said, smiling in reply; "it's restful to be with you. Sing to me, won't you?" He stretched luxurionsly on the sofa.

She obeved, glad enough of the now rare opportunity of pleasing him. F'arraday had brought lier some Norse ballads not loug before; their sad elfin cadenes hard charmed her. She sung these now, touching the piano ligh for far of waking the slerping baty overhead. Turmar to Stofan at the emo, she fond him somme asleep, one arm dromping over the sofa, the nerons limes of his face smoothed like a tired child's. For some reason she folt strangely pitifnl toward lim. "He must be very tired, poor boy," she thonsht.

Crossing to the kitchem, she warned Lily not to enter the sitting room, and herself slipped upstairs to the bals. Stefan shept till dimer time, and for the rest of the evening was mmanally kind and ghict.

As they went up to bed ling turned wistfully to him.
"Wouldn't you like to look at Elliston? You haven't seen him for a lung time."
"Bless me, I suppose I haven't--let's take a peep at him."

Together they bent over the eradle. "Why, he's looking quite human. I think he must have grown!' his father whispered, apparently surprised. "Does he make much noise at night nowadays, Mary?"

WINGS

"No, hardly any. He just whimpers at about two o'elock, and I get up and nurse lim. Then he sleeps till after six."
"If you don't mind, then," said Stefan, "I think I will sleep with you to-night. I feel as if it would rest me."
"Of eourse, dearest." She felt herself blushing. Was she really going to be loved again? She smiled happily at him.

When they were in bed Stefan eurled up ehildishly, and putting one arm about her, fell asleep almost instantly, his head upon her shoulder. Mary lay, too happy for slecp, listening to his quiet breathing, until her shoulder ached and throbbed under his head. She would not move for fear of waking hin, and remained wide-eyed and motionless until her baby's voice called to her.

Then, with infinite eare, she slipped away, her arm and shoulder numb, but her heart lighter than it had been for many weeks.

She had forgotten to put out her dressing gown, and would not open the closet door, because it creaked. Litthe Elliston was leisurely over his repast, and she was stiff with cold when at last she stole back into berl. Stefan lay upon his side. She erept close, and in her turn put an arm about him. He was here again, her man, and her child was close at hand, warm and comforted from her breast. Love was all about her, and to-night she was not mocked. Warm again from his touch, she, too, fell at last, with all the dreaming house, aslecp.

III

STEFAN stayed at lome for several days, sleeping long hours, and seemingly unusually subdued. He would lie reading on the sofia while Mary wrote, and often she turned from her manuseript to find him dozing. They took a few walks together, during which he rarely spoke, but seemed glad of her silent company. O.ce he ealled with her on Mrs. Farraday, and aetually held an enormous skein of wool for the old lady while she, busily winding, told them aneedotes of her son James, and of her long dead husband. He made no effort to talk, seeming eoutent to sit reeeptive under the soothing flow of her reminiseences.
"Thee is a good boy," said the little lady, patting his hand kindly as the last shred of wool was wound.
"I'm afraid not, ma'am," said he, dropping quaintly into the address of his childhood. "I'm just a rudderless boat staggering under topheavy "qils."
"Thee has a sure harbor, son," she answered, turning her gentle eyes on Mary.

IIe seemed about to say more, but cheeked himself. Instead he rose and kissed the little lady's hand.
"You are one of those who never lose their harbor, Mrs. Farraday. We 're all glad to lowar sail in yours."

On the way home Mary linked her arm in his.
"'You were so sweet to her, dear,"' she said.
"You're wondering why I can't always be like that, eh, Mary?"

She laughed and nodded, pressing his arm.
"Well, I ean't, worse luck,'" he answered, frowning.
That evening, while they sat in the dining room over their dessert, the telephone bell rang. Stefan jumped hastily to answer it, as if he felt sure it was for him, and he proved right.
"Yes, this is I," he replied, after his first "hello," in what seemed to Mary an artificial voice.

There was a pause; then she heard him say, "Yon can ?" delightedly, followed by "To-monew mornine at ten? Hurrah! No more wasted time; we shall really. set on now." Another panse, then. "Oh, what domes it matter abont the store?" impationtly-and at last "Well, to-morrow, anyway. Yes. Good-hye." The receiver chicked into place, and Ste fan eame skipping back into the room radiant, his languor of the last few days completely gone.

Mary's heart sank like a stone. It was ton obvious that he had stayed at home, not to be with leer, but merely because his sitter was unoitainable.
"Cheers, Mary; back to work to-mornow," he exelained, attacking his dessort with vigor. "Ire heen slacking shamefully, but Felicity is so wrapped up in that store of hers I ean't get her half the time. Now she's contrite, and is qoing to sit to-morrow."
Mary, remembering his remark ahont Nr.ENan, lonered to say, "Why do you call that little migavian hy her first nane?" but retaliatory methods were iupnossible in her. She contented herself with asking if he would be home the next evening.
"Why, yes, I expect so," he answered. looking vagne, "but don't absolutely count on me, Mary. I've been very good this week."

She saw that he was gone again. Ilis return had been more in the body than the spirit, after all. If that had been wooed a little back to her it had winged away again at the first sound of the telephone. She told herself that it was only his work ealling him, that he wonld have been equally eager over any other sitter. But she was not sure.
"Bralee up, Mary," he ealled aeross at her, "you're not being deserted. Good heavens, I must work!" His impatient frown was gathering. She collected herself. smiled eheerfully, and rose, telling Lily they would have coffee in the sitting room.

He spent the evening before the fire, smoking, and making thumbnail sketches on a piece of notepaper. She sang for some tine, but without elieiting any comment from him. When they went up to bed he stopped at his own door.
"I think I'll sleep alone to-night, dear. I want to be fresh to-morrew. Good night," and he kissed her cheek.

When she eame down in the morning he had already gone. Lying on the sitting room table, where it had been placed by the careful Lily, lay the serap of notepaper he had been seribbling on the night before. It was covered with tiny heads, and figures of mermaids, dancing nymphs, and dryads. All in face or figure suggested Felicity Berber.

She laid it back on the table, dropping a heavy book over it. A little later, while she was giving Elliston his bath, it suddenly oceurred to Mary that her husband had never once during his stay alluded to her manuseript. and never booked at the balye exerpt when she had askel him to. She exeused him to herself with the plea of his temperament, and his absorption in his art, but neverthe. less her heart was sore.

For the next few werks Stefan came and went fit fully, announcing at one point that Miss Berber had ceased to pose frer his fantastic study of her, called "The Nixie," but had comsenteal to sit for a portrait.
"She s slippery-comes and goes, keepe me waiting interminabls:" he complained. "I cam never be sure of her, but slee's a wonderful morlch."
"What do you do while pou ve waiting for her?" asked Mane, who could not ! magine Stefan cmburing with equamimity surh a tax upon his patiener.
"Oh, there's tremedulons werk to be done on the Nixie still," he answered. "It's onl! her part in it that is finisher."

One evening he came home with a grievanee.
"That fool Mrewan same to the stmdio to-dare" he complained. "It was all I combld do not to s! ant the door in his fate. Of all the emmetchats! What do yon think he called the Nixic? 'A trick! pirere of work!' Tricky!"' Stefan kieked the fire discrustedly. "And it 's the best thing l're done!
"As for the pontreit. he said it was "fine and dands," the it'iot. Ind the maddening thing was," he went ons. tuming io Nars an l uncowering the real source of his offor "that ledicity poxitisely encotatand him! Why. the man must have sat there falking with her for till I had said so three times!" eomphtenl stefen, looking positively forocious. "What in the fiemes name. Mary, did she do it for?" IIe collapsed on the sofa beside her, like a child bereft of a toy. Mary could not help laughing at his tragic air.
"I suppose she did it to annoy, because she knew it teased," she suggested.
"How I loathe fooling and play-aeting!" he exclaimed disqustedly. "Thank God, Mary, you are sincere. One knows where one is with yon!"

Ife seemed thoronghly mpset. Miss Berber's pin-prick must have been severe, Mary thought, if it resulted in a compliment for her.

The next evening, Mary being alone, Wallace dropped in. For some time they talked of Jamic and Elliston, and of Mary's book.

He was Scoteh to-night, as he nsually was now when they were alone together. Cheerful as ever, his cheer was yet slow and solid-the comedian was not in evidence.
"Hac ye been up yet to sec the new pietures?" he asked presently. She shook her head.
"Ye should go, bairn, they're a fine key. Clever as the devil, but naething true about them. After the Danaë-piff!" and he smapped his fingers. "Ye hae no call to worry, you're the hub, Mary-let the wheel spin a wee while!"

She bhished. "Wallace. I believe you're a wizardor a detective."
"The Senttish Shertock, eh?") he grimned. "Weel, it's as I tell ye-tak my worl for't. Hate ye sien Mrs. Ellint lately?"
"No, Constance went up to their place in Vipmont in June, yon know. She ame down maposely for Elliston 's fhristening. the doar. She whites we she th be batk in a few days now, but says she's sick of New York, and would stay where she is if it weren't for suffrage."
"But she would na'," said MeEwan emphatically.
"No, I don't think so, either. But she sees more of Thendore whiln she stus away, because he feels it his duty to run up every few days and protect her against savage New lingland, whereas when she's in town she could drive her ear into the subway exeavations and he d never know it. I'm quoting verbatim," Mary lanohol.

Me Ewan nodded appreciatively. "She's a ge:and card."
"She pretends to be flippant about husbands." Mary went on, "but as a matter of fact she cares much more for hers than for her sons, or anything in the world, except perhaps the Cause."
"That's as it should be," the other nodded.
"I don't know." There was a puzzled note in Mary's voice. "I can't understand the son's taking such a distinetly sceond place."

MeEwan's face expanded ints one of his hinge smiles. "It's true, se could not. That's the way (ion made ye, and I'll tell ye abont that, too, some day,' he said, rising to go.
"Good-bye, Mr. IIolmes," she smiled, as she saw him ont.

Before aning to bed that night Mary examined her conseience. Why had she not been to town to see Stefan's work? She knew that the baby-whose feeding times now eame less freruently-was no longer an adeguate excuse. She had blamed Stefan in her heart for his indifference to her work-was she not becoming guilty of the same neglect? Wis she mot in danger of a worse fault, the mean and vulgar fault of jealousy? She felt berself tlushing at the thought.

258 THE NEST-BUILDER

Two days later Mary put on her last year's suit, now a little shabby, kissed the baby, importuned the beaning Lily to be careful of him, and drove to the train in one of the village livery stable's inconerivably deerepit coupés.

It was about twelve o'elock when slie arrived at the studio, and, ringing the bell, mounted tile well-known stairs with a heart which, in spite of herself. beat anxionly. Stefan opened the door irritably, but nis frown changed to a look of astonishment, followed by an exuberaut smile, as le saw who it was.
"Inre comes Demeter," he eried, calling into the room belind him. "Why, Mar:, I'm honored. ILas Elliston actually released his prisoner at last?" He drew her into the studio, and kissed her almost with ostentation.
"Let's suspend the sitting, Felicity," he eried, "and show our work."

Mary looked about her. Her old home was almost unchanged. There was the painted bmran, the divan, the big easel, the model throne whrer she had posed as Danaë. It was muchanged, yet how different. From the throne stepped down a suall svelt figure-it rippled toward her, its gown shimmering like a fire seen through water. It was Felicity, and hiv dreses was made from the great piece of oriental silk Stefan had bought when they were first married, and which they lad used as a cover for their couch.

Mary recognized it instantly-there could be no mistake. She stared stupinlly, unable to tind speech, while Miss berber's tones were wafted to her like an echo from cooing doves.
"Ah, Mrs. Byrd," she was saying, "how lovely you look as a matron. We are having a short sittiug in my luncheon hour. This studio ealms me after the banal caekling of my clients. I almost think of ceasing to create raiment, I weary so of the stupidities of Now York's four hundred. Corsets, heels" -her hands flattered in repudiation. She sank full length upon the divan, lighting a eigarette from a ease of mother-ofpearl. "Your lusband is the only artist, Mrs. Burd, who has sueceeded in painting me as an individual instead of a beanty. It's relieving'- -her voice fainted-"very"-it failed-her lids drooped, she was still.

Stefan looked bored. "Why; Felicity, what's the mat. ter? I haven t seen you so eompletely lethargie for a long time. I thought you kept that manner for the store."

Mary could not help feeling pleased by this remark, which drew no response from Felicity sare a sladowy but somewhat foreed smile.
"Turn round, Mary," went on Stefan; "the Nixie is behind you."

Mary faced the canvas, another of his favorite underwater pictures. The Nixie sat on a rock, in the green light of a river-bed. Green river-wed swayed and clung about her, and her hain, green too, streamed ont to mingle with it. In the onze at her feet lay a drowned eirl, holding a tiny baby to her breast. This part of $\therefore \ldots, \boldsymbol{q}_{1} 10$ was unfinished, but the Nixie stond out ell! Whins down at the dead woman with an expression comp anded of wonder and sly scorn. "Lord. What fools these :Mortals be," she might have been saying.

The face was not a portrait--it was Felicity why in its potentialities, but it was she, ummistakably. Thic pieture was brilliant, fantastie, and unpleasant. Mary sidi so.
"Of conrse it is unpleasant," he answered, "and so is life. Isn"t it unpleasant that girls shonld kill themselves because of some fool man? And wouldn't sub-humans have a right to ribald laugliter at a system which fosters such things?"
"Ire has painted me as a sub-human, Mrs. Byrd," drawled Felicity through her smoke, "but when I hear his opinion of humans I feel complimented."
"It seems to me," said Mary, "that she's not laughing at hunans in general, but at this particular girl, for laving eared. That's what makes it unpleasant to me."
"I dare say she is," said Stefan earelessly. "In any case, I'm grlad you find it unpleasant-in popular criticism the word is only a synonym for true."

To Mary the pieture was theatrical rather than true, but she did not eare to argue the point. She turued to the portrait, a elever study in lights keyed to the opaleseent tones of the silk dress, and showing Felicity poised for the first step of a dance. The face was still in chareoal-Stefan always blocked in his whole color scheme before begimning a head-but even so, it was alluring.

Mary said with truth that it would be a fine portrait.
"Yes, I like it. Full of movement. Nothing arehitectural about that," he said, glancing by way of contrast at the great Demeter drowsing from the furthest wall. "The silk is interesting, isn't it?"

Mary's throat ached painfully. He was utterly uneonseious of any hurt to her in the transfer of this first extravagance of theirs. If he had done it eonseiously, with intent to wound, she thought it might have hurt her less.
"It's very pretty," she said conventionally.
"Rare, perhaps, rather than pretty;" murnured Miss Berber behind her veil of smoke.

Mary flushed. This woman had a trick of always making her appear gauche. She looked at her wateh, not sorry to see that it was alrendy time to leave.
"I must go, Stefan, I have to catel the one o'clock," she said, holding out her hand.
"What a shame. Can "t yon even stay to hmeh?" he asked dutifully. She shook her head, the ache in her throat making speech difficult. She seemed very stiff and matter-of-fact, he thonght, and her clothes were uninteresting. IIe kissed her, lowever, and held the door while she shook hands with Felicity, who half rose. The transom was open, and through it Mary, who had paused on the landing to button her glove, overheard Miss Berber's valedietory pronouncement.
"The English are a remarkable race-remarkable. Character in them is fixed-in us, fluid."

Mary sped down the first flight, in terror of hearing Stefan's reply.

All that evening she held the baby in her arms-she eonld hardly bring herself to put him down when it was time to go to bed.

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)

IV

OI November the 1st Mary received their joint bank book. The figures appaller! her. She had drawn nothing exeept for the household bills, but Stefan had apparently been drawing eash, in sums of fifty or twenty-five dollars, every few days for weeks past. Sare for his meals and a little new clothing she did not know on what he conld have spent it ; but as they had made nothing since the sale of his drawings in the spring, their onee stout balance had dwindled alarmingly. One check, evell while she felt its extravagance, touehed her to sympathy. It was drawn to IIenrik Jensen for two hundred dollars. Stefan must have been helping Adolph’s brother to his feet again; perhaps that was where more of the money had gone.

Stefan came home that afternoon, and Mary very unwillingly tackled the subject. He looked surprised.
"I'd no idea I'd been drawing so much! Why didn't you tell we sooner?" he exclaimed. "Yes. I've given poor old Ilenrik a bit from time to time; I thought I'd mentioned it to you."
"Yon did in the summer, now I come to think of it, but I thought you meant a few dollars, ten or twenty."
"Much good that would have done him. The poor old chap was stranded. He's all right now, has a new business. I've been meaning to tell you about it. He supplies furniture on order to go with Felicity's gownsbaekgrounds for personalities, and all that stuff. I put 262 it up to her to help fimb him a job, and she thought of this right off." He erimmed appreciatively. "smart, ch? We both gave him a haml to start it."
"You micflat have tohl me, I shomld have been so intrested," said Mary, tryine not to somm hurt.
"I meant to, but it sonly just heen arraved, and I ve had no chame to talk to yon for arse.."
"Not my doinge, strfam," sher said softly.
"Oh, ves the babe and all that." He wased his arm vaguely; and began to fidget. She steered ansay fiom the rocks.
" Inyhow, I'm glad pou've helped him," she said sincerely.
"I knew you would be. Look here, Mary, can we go on at the present rate-baring Jensen-iill ifinsh the Xixie? I don't want Constantine to have the: Demeter alone, it isn "t gool rmongh."
"I think it is as goonl as the Nixie." she said, on a sudden impulse. He swong romal, staring at her ahmost insolently.
"My dear girl, what do you know about it?" His voire was cold.

The blood rushed to ber heart. Hi had newer spoken to her in that tone before. As ahways. her hurt silenced her.

Ife prowled for a minute, then repeated his question abont their expenses.
"I don't want to have to think in cents again unless I must." he added.

Mary considered, remembering the now almost finished mamm ript in her desk.
"Yes, I think we can manage, dear."
"That's a blessing; then we won't talk about it any more," he exchamed, pinching her ear in token of satisfaction.

264 THE NEST-BUILDER

The next day Mary sent her mannseript to be typed. In a weck it had gone to Fiarraday at his oftice, complete all hat three chapters, of which she enclosed an ontline. With it she sent a purely formal note, asking, in the event of the book being accented, what terms the Company conld offer her, and whother she could be paid partly in advance. She put the request tentatively, knowing nothing of the method of paying for serials. In another week she had a typewritten reply from Farraday, saying that the serial had been most favorably reported, that the Company would buy it for fifteen hundred dollars, with a guarantee to begin serialization within the year, on roceipt of the final chapters, that they enclosed a contract, and were hers faithfully, ete. With this was a personal mote from her friend, eongratulating her, and explaining that his estimate of her book had been more than borne out by his readers.
"I don't want you to think others less appreciative than I," was his taetful way of intimating that her work had been ace , ted on its merits alone.

The letters took Jary's breath away. She had no idea that her work eould feteh such a priee. This stroke of fortune eompletely lifted her financial anxieties, but her spirits did not rise eorrespondingly. Six months ago she would hav ${ }^{\text {romen girlishly trinmphant at such a suc- }}$ eess, but now rue felt at most a dull satisfaction. She hastened, however, to write the final chapters, and deposited the cheek when it came in her own bank, draw. ing the next month's housekeeping money half from that and half from Stefan's rapidly dwindling aceount. That she was able to do this grawe her a feelng of relideno more.

Mary had now mursed lace baly for aver four montlu, and began to feel a morvolis lassitule which she a tributed-ruite wrongly-to this fact. As Ellinton still dition no thonglit. hat the last leaber had fallen from the trees, sea and wooxis looked fricudless, amb the ereminers were long and lonely. The neighbors hat noarle all gone back to the city. Farmay only rame down at week-ends, Janie was busy with lis lessuns, and Constance stil' limereel in Vermont As for Stefan, he came home late and left carly: ofte. he did not come at all. She began to puestion serionsly if she had been right to remain in the rottage. Iter heart told her no, but her pride said yes, and her pride was strong: abo, it was backed by reason. Her steady brain, which was capable of quite impersonal thinking, told her that Stefan wonld be actively diseontented just now in company with his family, and that this diseontent would eat into his remaining love for her.

But her heart repudiated this mental cantioning, erying out to her to go to him, to pour out her love and need, to eapture him safoly in her arms. Sore than once she nerved herself for such an effort, only to become ineapable of the least expression at his approach. Emotionally inarticulate even in happiness, Mary was nite dumb in grief. Ifer conversation berame trite. her sore heart drew a mantle of the commonplace over its wound; Stefan found her more than ever. "English."

So lonely was she at this cime that she would have asked little Miss Mason to stay with her, but for the lack of a spare bedromm. Of all her friends, only thes. Farradiey remained at hand. Nary seent mamy homes at the old lady's homse, and rejoiced eath time the pong chaise bromght her to the byedsuest. Ilrs. Farraday loved to drive up in the moming and watel the smalt Elliston in his bath, eomparing his feats with her memories of her own baby she thiked, too, to call at the cottage for mother and chikh, and take them for long rambling drives behind her raminant pony.

266

But the little (puakeress usmally had her house full of guests-fuaint, edderly folk from Delaware or from the Quaker regions of Pembshemia-and comhl not wive more than one asional tima to these exemrsions. She had become devoted to Mary, whom she seeretly regarded as her ideal of the woman her James should marry. That her son had not yet met such a woman was, after the loss of her hasband, the little lady's greatest grief.

In the midst of this dead period of graying days, Constance Elliot burst one morning-a God from the Ma-chine-tearing down the lane in her dimimative car with the great fignre of Cimether, like some Norse divinity, beside her. She fell ont of her anto, and into an explanation, in one loreath, embracing Mary warmly between sentences.
"You lovely creature, here 1 an at last! Theodore hadn't been np for a week, so I came down, to find Ilr. Gunther thmalering like Otlin becanse I had promised to help him arrange sittinge with yon, and had forgetten it. I had to bring han at once. He salys his gromp is all done bont the two heads, and he mast have womes and the bahy's. Bat he'll tell you all ahont it. Where is lw: Elliston, I mean. I re bronght him some short frock:. Where are they; Mr. Gunther? If he's put them in his pockets, he ll never find them--they are feet long-the pockets, I mean. Bless yon, Mary Byrd, how good it is to see you! Come into the house, every one, and let me rest."

Mary was bubbling with lamghter.
"Constance, you hmman dynamo, we'll go in by all means, and hold our breaths listening to your 'resting" ! '
"Don't sass your elders, naughty girl. Oh, my heavens, I ve bern tive months in New Ene 'and, and have behaved like a perfect gentlewoman all the time! Now I in due for an attack of Niw Yorkitis!'" Constane rushed into the sitting room, pulled off her hat and patted her hair into shape, ran to the kitchen deor to say hello to Lily, and was back in her chair by the time the others had found theirs. Her quiek glanee traveled from one to the other.
"Now I shall listen," she said. "Mary, tell your news. Mr. (iunther, explain your ideas."

Mary laughed again. "Visitors first," she nodded to the Norwegian who, as always, was staring at her with a perfeetly civil fixity.

He placed a great hand on either knee and prepared to state his ease. With his red-gold beard and piercing eyes. he was, Mary thought, quite the handsomest, and, after Stefan, the most attractive man she had ever seen.
"Mrs. Byrd," he began, "I am dwing, among other things, a large group ealled 'Pioneers' fur the Frisco exhibition. It is finished in the clay-as llrs. Elliot saidall but two heads, and is already ronshly blocked in marble. I want your head, with rour son's-I must have them. Six sittings will be enough. If you eannot, as I imagine, come to the eity, I will bring my elay here, and we will work in your hushand's studio. These figmes, of whom the man is modeled from mself. do not represem pioneers in the ordinary sense. They embody my idea of those who will lead the rane to future greatmess. That is why I fee it essential to have you ans at model."

268

THE NEST-BUILDER

He spoke guite simply, withont a trace of flattery, as if he were merely putting into words a self-evident trinth. A compliment of such stargering dimensions, however, left Mary :bashed.
"Y'ou may womler," he went on, seeing her silent, "why I so refard you. It is not merely your beanty, Mrs. Byrd, of which as an artist I can speak withont offense, it is becanse to my mind you combine strong mentality and morale with simplicity of temperament. You are an Apolloman, rather than a Dionysian. Of such, in my judment, will the super-race be made." Gunther folded his arms and leaned back.

He was suifieiently distinguished to be able to earry off a pronouncem nt which in a lesser man would have been in impertinenee, and he knew it.

Constance threw up her hands. "There, Mary, your' niche is carved. I don't quite know what Mr. Gunther means, but he somuds right."

Mirry found her voice. "Mr. Gunther honors me' very much, and, although of eourse I do not deserve his praise, I shall eertain!? not refnse his request."

Gunther bowed gravely from the hips in the Continental manner, withont rising.
"When may I come," he asked; "to-morrov? Good! I will bring the clay out ly anto."
"You lucly woman," exchimed Constance. "'in think of being immortalized ly two great artints in one year!"
"IIer type is very rare," sad (imnther in explamation. "When dres one sce the classide fiace with expression added? Amost alwins, it is dinll."
"Now, Mary, prodnce the infant!" (omstanee did not intend the whole morniner to be devoted to the Oldmpian disconrse of the semptor.

The baby was brourht down, and the rest of the visit pisoted about him. Nary growed at the praises he received; she looked immeasmably brighter, Constance thonght, than when they armed.

On the way home Gimther mosomed himself of a fimal pronomeement. "She does mot look ton happe, lut her beanty is richer and its meming deeper than before. She is what the mothers of men shonld be. [ "m sorry,", concluded simply, "that I did not meet iner nore than a year ago."

Constance almost gasped. What ..i. advantage, she thought, great physical rifts bring. Ewen without this man's distinction in hart, it was obvious that he had some right to arcume ability to mate with whomerer he might ehoose.

Early the next morning the sculptor drove up to the barn, his tomean loaded with impedimenta. Mary was ready for him, and watched with interest while he lifted out first a great wooden box of clay, then a small model throne, then two turntables, and finally, two tin luekets. These baffed her, till, having installed the clay-box, which she doubted if an ordinary man could lift, he made is the gat aen pump and watered his elay with the contents of the buckets.

He set up his three-legeged turntables, ach of which borr an angle-iron supporting a twisted length of lead pipe, stood a bucket of water bencath one, amb explained that in a few minutes he wond be realy to begin. Donning a linen blonse, he attacked the bas: of danmp alay pawerfally, throwing great pieres onto the skeleton leadpipe, which he explained had been bent to the exact angle of the head in his group.
"The woman's figure I modeled from ideal proportions, Mrs. Byrd, and this lead will he set upon its shoulders. My statue will then be a living thing instead of a mere symbol."

When Mary was posed she became absorbed in watehing Gunther's worl: grow. Ile modeled with extraordinary speed, yet his movements had none of the lightning swoops and darts of Stefan's method. Each motion of his powerful hamds might have been preordaned; they. seemed to move with a deliberate and effortless precision. so that she would hardly have realized their speed had the head and face not leaped und-r them into being. Te was a silent worker, yet she felt companioned; the man's presenee seemed to fill the little building.
"I fter to-day I shall ask you to hold the ehild, for at; longr as it will not disturb him. I shall then have the expression on your face which ${ }^{\boldsymbol{r}}$ desire, and I will work at a study of the boy's head at those moments when he is: awake."

Mary sineerely enjoyed her sittings, whieh came as a weleome change in her even days. Gunther usually stayed to luneh, Constance joinir ; them on one occasion, and Mrs. Farraday on another. Both these came to wateh the work, Gunther, unlike Stefa!, being oblivious of an audience; and once McEwan came, his sturdy form appearing insipnifienht bemide the giant Nomman.

 and ejambated lye, ase, semeal timm. mombling a 1mataroms hatad.

- Wrallame, what are yon so colcmuly aspe-invine abont?

"I 'in hamine a few therlats." reprombed the s...n'. his "xpression divided bitwen an irritatimer smile and a kiudly twinkto.

 the sittinges, expresem a mial interent in the umes of them, and, going out to the barm, maraped the wet dothes from the head.
"Inc"s an artist," satid he; "this has power and beante. Never sit to serond-rater, Mall: for be hat the best now:" And he rovered the head again with a craftsman's thoroughness.

Mare was some when the sittives comm to an end. On the last day the sonptor brought two mel with him. who mase the retam journey in the 1 It an eh ghanding a carefully swathed bust argaint Ho. :athis of the roul. Cimuther bowed low over hem han ith : woded of thanks at parting, and she watchend ho ont of si:ht regretfully.
 to their monotomome tebler. As Xovember arew to a elose, whe begall io think of 'hristmas, rememe bering how happy her lant had hern, and wom ring if grage Stofan is interest in some kiml of emblation. She now almitfed to herself that whe of a atively worriod abont her relations with him. He was quite agrerable to here when in the house, but she felt this was omly beranse she made no demamds on hime. Lat her reade ont eron so little for his love, and the instantly berame vasue or restless. 'Their interembe was frimblly, but he appeared absohtely endifterent to her as a woman; she might have been a well-liked sister. I'mere the ermetines strain of self-repression Jary was growind norvons, ant the baby began to feel the offerts. His wedly gatis wre smaller, and he had his first symptoms of indigestion.

She redombled the cate of here diet, amd hemethemed her daily walks, but he beeame fretful, ame at last, canle in Deeember. she found on weighing him that he had mate no gatis for a werk. Territied, she telephoned for lor. Hillyard, amd reefved her at the dome with a white face. It was a Smmay morning and Meliwan had just dropped in with some chresanthemmens from the Farratarss greenhouse. Fimliner Mary disturbed he had not remamed, and was leaving the house as the doctor drove up.

Dr. Iillyard's first words were reassuring. There tle, amd with tears ol disappuintument liary vinhled to lis for failing hims so soon, and a there of real reselithent colored for the first time lere attitule foward stolials,

The somewhat abrupt datorionation os Mary's masnifient nervons system wonld labe been masecomutabie to IOr. Llillyard had it mot been for a chamee mbonmotro with Mebivan after her lirst visit. The seotehmar hand hailed lar in the lane, asking for a lift to il honse bebourl the village, where he had some small emintel. Huring a flow of disentsive remarks he elidited form the doetore whout her knowledge, her opinion that May was merve onsly rme down, aftel which he rambled at sonar lemerth abont the value of art, allowing the docetor to patis his destination by a mile or more.

W'ith profise thanks for her kindness in tominer batck, he continned his ramblings, and she githored the inmperssion that ho was a rlull, inemsequential talkir. that he considered voung couples "kittle rattle", that artists were always absorbed in their work, that females had a hathit of needless worrving, and that commnting in winter was distracting to a man's labors. She only half listened to him, and dropped him with relief, wondering if he was an anti-sufiragist. Some memory of his remarks must, however, have remained with her, for after her next visit to Mary she fomm herself thinking that Mr. Mekwan was probably neither an anti-suffragist, nor duil.

274 THE NEST-BUILDER

A little before Christmas Mceman called on Constance. and found her immersed in preparations for a Suffrage bazaar and fite.
"I ean't talk to any one," she amomeed, receiving him in a chass of boses, bamers, paper flowers, and stenographers, in the midst of which she appeared to be: working with two voices alled six hands. "Didn't the maid warn you off the premises?"
"She did, but I sang "Take back the lime that thou "avest' in such honey tones that she eomplied," said Mac.
"Just for that, you can give the fete a two-inch free ad in The IIouschold Magazine," Constance implacabl? replied.

He grimned. "I raise the ante. Three inches, at th" risk of losing my job, for five minntes alone with you.
"You lose your job!" scoffed Constance, leading the way into an empty room, and seating herself at attention, one cye on her watch. "Proced-l am yours."

Mae sat opposite ler, and shot out an emphatic forefinger.
"The Berber girl's middle name is Misehief," he began, plunging in medias res; "l3yrd's is Variability; for the last five months the Mary lady's has been Mother. Am I right?"

Constance's bright eyes looked sfuarely at him. "Wallace McEwan, you are," she said.
His finger continued poised. "Y'ry well, we are 'on,' and our middle name is Efficien'y, eh?"
"Yes," Constance undded donbtfully, "hat-"
Mebwan's hand slapped his kinee. "Inere's the scheme," he went on rapilly. "Variable folk must have variety, either in place or people. If we don t winnt it to be people, we make it place, sec? Is your comutry house elosed yet?"
"No, I fancied I might go thare to relax for a week after the fête."
" 11 luck. You won't relax, you'll have a week's house-party, sleighing, skating, coasting. all that truck. The Byrds, Farraday (I'll persuade him he can leave the office), a couple of pretty skirts with no braiusme if you like. Get me?"

Constance gasped, her mind racing. "Put Mary's baby?" she exclaimed, clutching at the central difficulty.
"You're th goods," replied MeEwan admiringly. "She couldn't shine as Queen of the Slide if she was tied to the offispring-granted. Now then." IIe leant forward. "She's had to wean him-you didn't know that. Your dope is to talk up the honse-party, tell her she owes it to herself to get a elange, and make her leave the boy with a trained nurse. The Mary lady's no fool, she 'll be on."

Constance's eyes narrowed to slits, she fingered her bcads, and nodded onee, twice.
"More trouble," she said, "but it's a go. Sccond week in January."

'IIIE NES'I-13UILDER

He sraspuel her hant. "Yotes for Women," he beamed.

She looked at her watcli. "Five minutes exactly. Thre incirc, Mr. Ace Eran!’
"Threc inches!" he called from the door.

VI

CIIRISTMAS was a hank period for Nory that year. Stefan cam. Irrince on Christmas are in a mood of somewhat fomed eonviviality, but hary had had no heart for fotio preparations. Senian had failed her and she had fation her baty-th w two wer present faets shadowed her word. She har! immat presents for Lily and the bats, a pair of link- Sor shath, books for Mrs. Farraday and Jamie, and titit - fin' ('mstance and Miss Mason, but the holly and minitune, the tree, the new froek and the Christmas fare whin hormally she would have plamond with so muh jo we we missing. Stefan's gift to i: r-a fur-lined mat-was so extraragant that she coull iemive no ple:stre from it, and she had the impressim that he had chow it hurricdly, without much thousent of what wouhl hat ploase her. From Constance she weived a white manato of very beautiful heavy silk, with a eap and seilef to match, but she thought bitterly that pretty things to wi: P were of little use to her now:

It was obvious that Stof n's consciener primul him. Ife spent the morning hambing about her. amb wen played a little with his som, who now sat up, boanced, crowed with laughter, chatert every amide within reach, and had two teeth. Ia y's heart readied ont achingly to Stefan, but he setemed to her a strange man. The contrast between this and their last Christinas smote her intolerably.

In the afternoon they walked over to the Farradays', where there was a tree for Jamie and a few friends, inchuding the ehauffemr's and gardener's children. Here Stefan proxled into the picture gallery, while Mary, surrounded by children, was in her element. Returning to the drawing room, Stefan watched her playing with them as he had watched her on the Lusitania fifteen months before. She was less radiant now, and her figure was fuller, but as she smiled and langhed with the ehildren, her cheeks pink and her hair all a-glitter under the lights, she looked very lovely, he thonght. Why did the sight of her no longer thrill him? Why did he enjoy more the society of Felicity Berber, whom he knew to be affeeted and egotistic, and suspected of being insincere, than that of this beantiful, golden woman of whose truth he could never conceive a doubt?

A feeling of deep sadness, of unutterable regret, swept throngh him. Better never to have married than to have outhived so soon the magie of romance. Whieh of them had lost the key? When Mary had furled her wings to brood over her nest he had thought it was she; now he was not so sure.

Walking home through the dark woods he stopped suddenly, and drew her to him.
"Mary, my Beautiful, I'm drifting, hold me close," le whispered. Her breath eaught, she clung to him, he felt her face wet with tears. No more words were spoken, but they walked on comforted, groping their way under the damp fingers of the trees. Stefan felt no passion, but his tenderness for his wife had reawakened. For her part, tears had thawed her bitterness, without washing it away.

The next morning Constance drove over.
"Children," she said, hurrying in from the cold air, "what a dehicions seene! I invite mis'self to lunch."

Mary was playing with Ellinion on a blanket be the fire, Stefan sketching ther', the room full of sun and lirelight. The two greeted her delightedly.
"Now," she said, settling herself on the eonel, "let me tell your why I came." and she proceeded to mufold her plans for a honse-party at Burlington. "You've never seen our winter sports, Mary, ther be elorious and you need a change from so much domesti-ity. As for you, Mr. Byrd, it will give yon a dhane to leam that America can be attractive evon outside Now York."

Both the byrds were looking internsted, Stefan umreservedly, Mary with a pucker of doult.
"Now, don't begin about Elliston," exclaimed Constanef, forestalling oljections. "We "re heales of room, but it wonld spoil your fun to bring him. I want you to get a trained nmrse for the week-finest thing in the world to take a holiday from maternity once in a while." She timned to Stefan as a sure ally. "Don't you agree, Mr. Byrd?"'
"Emphatically," beamed he, seizing her hand and kissing it. "A glorious idea! Away with domesticity! A real breath of freedom, ch, Mary?", Constance again forestalled difficulties.

"We are all going to travel up hy night, ten of ns, and Theodore is engaging a compartment wat with rooms for every one there won't be any expense about that part of it, Ma . . my dear. Dors it seem too extravagant to ask you to get a trained nurse? I ve set my heart on having yon free to be the life of the party. All your admirers are coming. that worgeons finther. my beloved James, and Wallace MeEwan. I laitoi my hooks with TIIE NEST-BUILDERyou, so you simply can't disappoint me!" she coneluded triumphantly.

280

Stefan pricked up, his ears. Nere was Mary in a new guise; he had not thought of her for some time as having "admirers." Yet he had always known Farratay for one; and eertainly Gunther, who modeled her, and NeEwan: who dogged her footsteps, could admire her no less than the editor. The thought that his wife was sought alfer, that he was probahly envied by other men, warmed Stefan's heart pleasantly, just as Constance intended it should.
"It sounds fascinating, and I eertainly think we must eome," Mary was saying, "though I don't know how I shall bring myself to part with Elliston," and she hugged the baby elose.
"Yon born Nother!" said Constance. "I adored my boys, but I was always enchanted to eseape from them." She laughed like a girl. "Now you grasp the inwarduess of my Christmas present-it is a coasting outfit. Won't she look lovely in it, Mr. Byrd?"
"Glorious!" said Stefan, boyishly aglow; and "I don"t believe two and two do make four, after all," thought Constance.

All through luneheon they diseussed the plan with animation, Constance enlisting Mary's help at the Suffrage Fête the first s ok in January in advance payment, as she said, for the house-party. "Why not get your nurse a few days earlier to break her in, and be free to give me as much time as possible?" she urged.
"Good idea, Mary," Stefan ehimed in. "I'll stay in town that week and lunch with you at the bazaar, and you could sleep a night or two at the studio."
"We'll see," said Mary, a little non-eommittal. She knew she should enjoy the Fete inmensely, but somehow, she did not feel she could bring herself to sleep in the little studio, with Fencity the Nixie smeering down at her from one wall, and Felicity the Dancer challenging from the other.

But it was a much eheered couple that Constance left behind, and Stefan came home every afternoon during the week that remained till the opening of the bazaar.
Being in the eity for this event, Mary, in addition to engaging a nurse, indulged in some rather extravagant shopping. She had made up her mind to look her best at Burlington, and though Mary was slow to move, when she did take action her ratitiods were thorougl. She realized with gratitude that Constance, whom she suspected of linowing more than she indieated, had given her a wonderful opportunity of renewing her appeal to her lusband, and she was determined to use it to the full. Ineapable-as are ali women of her type-of coquetry, Mary yet knew the value of her beauty, and was too intelligent not to see that both it and she had been at a grave disadvantage of late. She understood dimly that she was confronted by one of the fundamental problems of marriage, the diffieulty of making an equal success lowa and motherhood. She could not put her husband , ermanently before her child, as Constance had done, and as she knew most Englishwomen did, but she meant to do it completely for this one week of holiday, at least.

Neanwhile, amidst the color and music of the great drill-hall where the suffragists held their yearly Fête, Mary, dispensing tea and mokes in a flower-garlanded

282

 THE NEST-BUILDERtent, enjo jed herself with simple whele-heartedness. Constance's waitresses were dressed as daffodils, and the ligh cap, representing the inverted cup of the flower, with the tight-sheathed yellow and green of the gown, was particularly becoming to Mary. She knew again the pleasure, which no one is too modest to enjoy, of being a center of admiration. Stefan dropped in once or twice, and waxed enthusiastic over Constance's arrangements and Mary's looks.

On one of these oceasions Miss Berber suddenly appeared in the tent, dressed wonderfilly in white panne, with a barbaric mottle of black and white civet-skins flung over one shoulder, and a tight-drawn cap of the fur, apparently held in place by the great claws of some feline mounted in heavy gold. She wore circles of fretted gold in her ears, and carried a tall ebony s.tick with a gold hatdle, Louis Quatorze fashion. From her huge civet muff a gold purse dangled. She looked at once more conventional and more dynamic than Mary had seen her, and her rich dress made the simple effects of the tent seem amateurish.

Neither Mary nor she attempted more than a formal salutation, but she discoursed languidly with Constance for some minutes. Stefan, who had been eating ict cream like a schoolboy with two pretty girls at the other side of the tent, came forward on seeing the new arrival, and after a good deal of undecided fidgeting, and a "See you later" to Mary, wandered off with Miss Berber and disappeared for the rest of the afternoon. In spite of her best efforts, Mary's spirits were completely dashed by this episode, but they rose again when Stefan met her at the Pennsylvania Station and traveled home with her.

WINGS

s. All nd the flower, gown, ain the bcing - twice, ements ly appanne, t-skins he fur, $f$ some cles of y s.tick om her ked at Mary effects formal nstance ing ice e other arrival, a "Sce per and pite of dashed net her ith her.

As they emerged from the speceh-deadening roar of the tunnel he said easually, "Felicity Berber is an amusing ereature, but she's a good deal of a bore at t mes." Mary took his hand linder the folds of their newspaper.

VII

ON the evening of their departure Mary parted from her baly witlo a pang, but she knew him to be in the best of hands, and felt no anxicty as to his welfare. The nurse she had oltained was a friend of Miss MeCullock's, and a most efficient and kindly young woman.

Their journey up to town reminded Mary of their first journey from Shadeham, so full of spirits and enthusiasm was Stefan. The whole party met at the Grand Central, and boarded the train amid laughter, introdnctions, ant much gay talk. Constance scintillated. The solid Mr: Elliot was quite shaken out of his sobricty, Me Ewan's grin was ai its broadest, Farraday's smile its pleasantest and the three young women whom Constance had col lected bubbled and shrilled merrily.

Only Gunther appeared untouched by the holiday at mosphere. He towered over the rest of the party caln and direct, disposing of porters and hand-baggrage with an unruffled perfection of address. Mary, watehing him, pulled Stefan's sleeve.
"Look," she said, pointing to two long ribbons of narrow wood lasied to some other impedimenta of Gum ther's. "Skis, Stefan, how thrilling! I've never seen them used."

Stefan nodded. "I'd like to get a drawing of that chap in action. His lines are magnificent."

WINGS

Mary had never been in a sterping ear before, and was faseinated to see the shoping miliness of the state-romes change like pantomime trick into bellas malore the deft hatrlling of the portore. She liked the white roat of this autocrat of the road, and the smat, mastin trimmings of the colored maid. She amd stefan hand the eompartmant next their host 's; Farmatay and Nablwan sharen one heyond; (imuther and his skis and Wialter, the Elliont yomuer son, completaly filted the hext; Mrs. Thayere. cherefnl yomag widow, and Miss Banter and Miss Vial Sittart, the two girls of the parts, orempicel the remail ing three. The drawing room hed bern left rmptes to serve as a general overflow. To this high-balls, comp. milk and sandwiches were borne by white-dapal waterfrom the huffet, and set upon a magieally installed table STrs. Thayer, Constanee, and the mein fill tupon the stronger beverages, while Mary and the girls divided 11 . milk.

Uuder eover of the general chatter Mc: Ewan raised hus glass to Constamee.
"I take off my hat to you, Mrs. Elliot, for a stagn' I 1 ager," he whispered, glameing at the other women. " I back-hared soubrette, a brown $r$ aly, and a redheaded slip; no rivals to the leading lady in this show!"
Their train reached Burlington in a flurry of snow, and they were bundled into big, two-seated sleighs for the drive out of the eity.

Mary, wrapped in her fur-lined eoat and eovered with a linge bearskin, watehed with interest the thly, dignified little town speed by. Even Stefan was willing to admit it had some elaims to the pieturesque, but a little way beyond, when they came to the open country, he gave almost a whonp of satisfiction. Before them stretehed tumbled hills, converging on an icebound lake. Thei snowy sides glitterof pink in the sim amb purple in tha shadows: they reared their frosted arests as if in weleom of the morning; behimd them the sky ghamend opalesernt Stefan keant forward in the spmering sleigh as if to urg it with the sway of his lowly, the feresty air sturg his nos trils, the breath of the horses trailed like smoke, the roas seemed leading up to the threslonte of the world. Th speed of their cold flight was in thme with the froze dance of the hills-Stefan whooped again, intoxicated the others lamghed back at him and cheremb, Mary's fac glowed with delight, they were like children in their joy

The Ellint house lay in a high fold of the hills, over looking the cakr, and ahmost out of sight of other builu ings. Within, all was spacions warmoth and the crackl of great wood fires; on every site the iey view, sem through wide windows, eontrasted with the glowing ent ors of the rooms. A steaming lrealifast waited to fortif. the hastily drunk coffee of the train. After it, when th Isyrds found themselves in their eozy bedroom witl it old New England furniture and blue-tiled bathroon Stefan, waltzing round the room, fairly hugged Mary excited glee.
"What fun, Beantifu!, what a lovely place, what air what snow!" She langhed with him, her own hat bounding with unwonted exieitement.

The six-day party was a marked suecess throngliout Even the two young girls were satisfied, for Constan eontrived the appearanee of several stalwart yontlis " the neighborhood to help her son leaven the group " older men. Mrs. Thayer flirted pleasantly and wittil with whoever chaneed to be at hand, Mr. Ellint hol nobbed with Farraday and made touchingly laborion

WINGS

Their in the: voleome leserent. to ure lis moslee road 1. The frozioll xicated, $\because$ 's face cir joṣ, ls, over$1 \cdot$ builil. erackl w, smoll ing (c)lfortily hout tin! witl its throom, Mary in hat air, 11 h :art mghout. onstall"en ouths of roup of wittily iot hohb aborious efforts to be frivolons, and MeEwan kept the household langhing at his gambols, heavy as those of a st. Bermard pup.

Constance darted from group to group like a purposeful humminebird, lout did not lack the supreme gift f a hostess-that of leaving her ghests reasonably alone.
All the women were inclined to hover about Byrd, who, with Gumther, represented the most attrartive male element. As the women were suffieinatly pretty and intelligent, Stefan enjoyed their notice, but Gunther stalked away from them like a great hound surrounded by lap-dogs. He was invariably con'teous to his hostess, but had eyes only for Mary. Never secming to follow her, and ravely talking to her alone, he was yet always to be found within a few yards of the spot she happened to occupy. Farraday would watch her from another room, or talk with her in his slow, kind way and Wallace always drew her into his absurd games or his sessions at the piano. But Gunther neither watched nor chattered, he simply was, seeming to draw a silent and complete satisfaction from her nearness. Of the men he took only cursory notiee, talking sometimes with Stefan on art, or with Farraday on life, but never seeking their society.
Indoors Gunther seemed neqative, ontdoors he became godlike. The Elliots possessed a little Norwegian sleigh they had brought from Europe. It was swan-shaped, stood on low wooden runners, and was brightly painted in the Norse manner. This Gunther found in the stable, and, promptly harnessing to it the fastest horse, drove round to the house. Striding into the hall, where the party was discussing plans for the day, he planted himself before Mary, and invited her to drive. The others, looking out of the window, exclaimed with pleasure at the pretty little sleigh, and Mary gladly threw on her cap and coat. Gunther tucked her in and started without a word. They were a mile from the house before he broke silence.

288

THE NES'T-BUILDER

"This sleigh comes from my country, Mrs. Byrd; I wish I could drive you there in it."

He did not speak again, and Mary was glad to enjoy the exhilarating air in silence. By several roads they had gradually climbed a hillside. Now from below they could see the house at some distance to their right, and another road rumning in one long slope almost straight to it from where they sat. Gunther suddenly stood up in the sleigh, braced his feet, and wrapped a rein round each arm.
"Now we will drive," said he. They started, they" gathered speed, they flew, the horse threw himself into a stretching gallop, the sleigh rocked, it leapt like a dashing wave. Gunther half eronched, swaying with it. The horse raced, his flanks stretched to the snow. Mary ehung to her seat breathless and tense with excitementshe looked up at the driver. His blue eyes blazed, his lips smiled above a tight-set jaw, he looked down, and meeting her eyes laughed trimmphantly. Expanding his great chest he uttered a widd, exultant ery-they seemed to be rushing off the world's rim. She could see nothing but the blinding fume of the npflung snow. She, too, wanted to ery alond. Then their pace slackened, she could see the road, black trees, a wall, a house. They drove into the courtyard and stopped.

The hall door was flung open. They were met ly a group of faces exeited and alarmed. Gunther, his eyes still blazing, helped her down and, throwing the reins to a waiting stable-boy, strode silently past the guests and up to his room.

WINGS

"Good heavens! you might have been lilled,'" fussed Mr. Elliot. Farraday looked pale, the women laughed excitedly.
"Mary," cried Stefan, his face flashing with eagerness, "you weren't frightened, were you?", She shook her head, still breathless.
"It was glorious, you were like storin gods. I've never seen anything so inspiring." And he embraced her before them all.

After this episode Gunther resumed his impassive manner, nor did any other of their outdoor sports draw from him the strange, exultant look he had given Mary in the sleigh. But his feats on the toboggan slide and with his skis were sufficiently daring to supply the party with liberal thrills. His obvious skill gained hin the captainey of the toboggan, but after his exhibition of driving, most of the women hesitated at first to form one of his crew. Mary, however, who was quite fearless and fascinated by this new sport, dashed down with him and the other men again and again, and was, with her white wraps and brilliant pink cheeks, as MeEwan had prophesied, "the queen of the slide."

Stefan was intoxicated by the tobogganing, and though he was only less new to it than Mary he soon became expert. But on his skis the great Norwegian was alone, the whole party turning out to watch whenever he strapped them to his feet. His daring leaps were, Stefan said, the nearest thing to flying he had ever seen. "For I don't count aeroplanes-they are mere machinery."

290 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Ah, if the lake were frozen enough for ice-boating," replied Gunther, "I could show you something nearer still. But they tell me there is little chance till February. for more than in-shore skating.'

Only in this last named sport had Gunther a rival, Stefan making up in grace what he lacked in practice. Beside his, the Norwegian's skating was powerful, but too unbending.

Mary, owing to the open English winters, had had less experience than any one there, but she was so much more graceful $a^{n ?}$ ? athletic than the other women that she soon outstripped them. She skated almost entirely with 'tefan, only once with Gunther, who, since his stra $a_{1-}$ c look in the sleigh, a little troubled her. On that one oceasion he tore round the clear ice at breakneck speed, halting her dramatically, by sheer weight, a few inches from the bank, where she arrived breathless and thrilled.

Secing her thus at her best, happy and admired, and full of vigorous life, Stefan found himself ahmost as much in love as in the early weeks of their marriage.
"You are more beantiful than ever, Mary," he exclaimed; "there is an added life and strength in you; you are triumphant."

It was a joy again to feel her in his arms, to know that they were each other's. After his troubled flights he came back to her love with a feeling of deep spiritual peace The night, when he could be alone with her, be came the happy climax of the day.

The amusements of the week ended in an impromptu dance which Constance arranged by a morning at the telephone. For this, Mary donned her main extrava ntirely iec his on that akneck a few ss and s muchgance, a dress of rainbow colored silk gauze, ent short to the ankle, and worn with pale pink slippers. She had found it "marked down" at a Fiftlo Aveme house, and had been told it was a model dubbed "Aurora." With it she wore her mother's pearl ormaments. Stefan was entranced by the result, and Constance almost wept with satisfaction.

WINGS

"Oh, Mary Byrd," she eried, hugging her daintily to aroid erushing the frock; "rou are the best thing that has happened in my family since my mother-in-law quit living with me."

That night Stefan was at his best. Delighted with all his surroundings, he let his faumlike spirits have full play, and his keen, brown face and gree.t-gold eyes flashed apparently simultancously from every corner of the room. Gunther did not dance; Farraday's method was correct but quict, and none of the men could rival Stefan in light-footed grace. Both he and Mary were ignorant of any of the new danees, but Constance had given Mary a lesson earlier in the day, and Stefan grasped the general selheme with his usual lightning rapidity. Then he leegan to embroider, inventing steps of his own which in turn, Mary was quiek to catch. No couple on the floor compared with them in distinction and grace, and they danced, to the chagrin of the other men and girls, almost entirely together.
Whatever disappointment this caused, however, was not shared by their hostess and MeEwan. After enduring several rounds of Mae's punishing daneing, Constance was thankful to sit out with him and watch the others. She was glad to be silent after her strenuous efforts as a hostess, and MeEwan was apparently too filled with satisfaction to have room left for speceh. His red face beamed, his big teeth glistened, pleasure radiated from him.
"Aye, aye," he chuckled, nodding his ponderous head, and again "Aye, aye," in tones of fat content, as the two Byrds swung lightly by.
"Aye, aye, Mr. McEwan," smiled Constance, tapping his knec with her fan. "All this was your idea, and you are a good fellow. From this moment, I intend to call you by your first name."
"Ayc, aye," beamed MeEwan, more broadly than before, cxtending a huge hand; "that'll be graud."

Tro dance was the climax of the week. The next day was their last, leave-takings were in the air, and towarl afternoon a bustle of packing. Stefan was in a moot of slight reaction from his excitement of the night before While Mary paeked for them both he prowled uneertainly about the house, and, finding the men in the library, whiled away the time in an utterly impossible attempt to quarrel with MeEwan on some theory of art.

They all left for the train with lamentations, and arrived in New York the next morning in a checrless storm of wet snow.

But by this time Mary's regret at the ending of their holiday was lost in joy at the prospect of secing her baly: She urged the stiff and tired Stefan to specd, and, hy cutting short their farewells and jumping for a street car, managed to make the next train out for Crab's Bay. She could hardly sit still in the decrepit cab, and it had barely stopped at their gate before she was out and teat ing up the stairs.

Stcfan paid the cab, carried in their suitcase, and wandered, cold and lonely, to the sitting room. For him their home-coming offered no alleviating thrill. Already, he felt, Mary's bright wings were folding again above her nest.

WINGS

VIII

REFRESHED, in spite of his natural reaction of spirits, by the week's holiday, Stefan turned to his work with greater content in it than he had felt for some time. His content was, to his own surprise, rather inereased than lessened by the diseovery that Felicity Berber had left New Yo:k for the South. Arriving at his studio the day after their return from Vermont, he found one of her eharaeteristie notes, in crimson ink this time, upon snowy paper.
"Stefan," it read, "the winter has found his strength at last in storms. But our friendship dallies with the various moods of spring. It leaves me restless. The snow chills without calining me. My designing is beauty wasted on the blindness of the eity's overfed. A need of warmth and stillness is upon me-the south elaims me. The time of my return is unrevealed as yet. Felicity."

Stefan read this epistle twiee, the first time with irritation, the second with relief. "Affeeted ereature," he said to himself, "it's a good job slee's gone. I've frit. tered away too mueh time with her as it is."

At home that evening he told Nary. His devotion during their holiday had already obscured ber memory of the autumn's unhappiness, and his carefree mamer of imparting his tidings laid any ghost of doubt that stili remained with her. Secure once more in his love, she was as uneloudedly happy as she had ever been.

In his newly acquired mood of sanity. Stefan faced the fact that he had less work to show for the last nine months than in any similar period of his earecr, and that he was still living on his last winter's suecess. What had these months brought him? An expensive and inconchusive flirtation at the cost of his wife's happiness, a few disturbing memories, and two unfinished pictures. Out of patience with himsclf, he phunged into his work. In two weeks of eoncentrated effort he had finished the Nisie, and had arranged with Constantine to exhibit it and the Demeter immediately. This last the dealer appeared to admire, pronouncing it a fint eanvas, thonyh inferior to the Danaë. About the Nixie h seemed in two minds.
"We shall have a newspaper story with that one, Mr. Byrd, the lady being so well known, and the subject so dramatic, hut if you ask me will it sell-" he shrugged his fat shoulders-"that's another thing."

Stefan stared at him. "I could sell that picture in Franec five times over."

Constantine waved his pudgy fingers.
"Ah, France! V'là c' qui est autre chose, 's pas? But if we fail in New York for this one I think we try Chicago."
The reception of the pictures proved Constantinc a shrewd prophet. The academie Demeter was applauded by the average eritic as a piece of decorative work in the grand manner, and a fit rebuke to all Cubists, Futurists, and other anarehists. It was bought by a eommittec from a western agrieultural college, which had come east with a check from the state's leading politician to purchase suitable mural eqrichments for the enllege's new building. Constantine persuaded these worthies that onc suitable painting by a distinguished artist would enrich their institution more than the half dozen canvases "tr fit the anditorium" which they had been inclined to or der. Moreover, he muleted them of two thonsand dol lars for Demeter, which, in his private estimation, wa more than she was worth. He aehieved the sale mor readily because of the newspaper controversy aronsen by the Nixic. Was this pieture a satire on life, or on the eelebrated Miss Berber? Was it great art, or merrl? melodrama? Were byrd's effects of river-light obtaine in the old impressionist manner, or by a subtler metho of his own? Was he a master or a poseur?

296 'THE NEST'-BULLDER

These and other questions brought his name into fress prominence, but failed to sell their object. Just, how ever, as Constantine was considering a journey for th Nixie to Chicago, a purchaser appeared in the shape of eertain Mr. Einsbacher. Stefan happened to be in th gallery when this gentleman, piloted by Constantine hin self, came in, and recognized him as the ederly sat! of the pouched eyes who had been so attentive to Felicit on the night of Constance's reception. When, late the dealer informed him that this individnal had hongl the Nisie for three thonsand, Stefan made no attem to eonceal his disgnst.
"Thousand devils, Constantine, I don't paint for swil of that type," said he, scowling.

The dealer's hands wagged. "IIis cheek is good." replied, "and who knows, he may die soon and leave ti picture to the Metropolitan."

But Stefan was not to be mollified, and went home th afternoon in a state of high rebellion against all eon mercialism. Mary tried to console him by pointing o that even with the dealer's commission deducted, he hat nd dolon, was le more arousind or or merely btained methond to fresh st, howfor the ape of a e in the ine linnly satyr Felicit! n, later?, 1 hourht attempt or swine
ood. " he leave the ome that all comating out d, he had made more than a year's ineome from the two sales, and could now work again free from all amxiety.
"What's the good," he exclaimed. "of prodmeing beauty for sheep to bleat and momkeys to loer at! What's the good of prochreing it in America at all? Who wants, or understands it?"
"Oh, Stefan, heaps of people. Doesn 't Mr. Farraday understand art, for instance?"
"Farralay." he smorted, "res!-hamdseapes and women with children. What does he know of the radiance of beauty, its mystery, the hot soul of it? Oh, Mary," he Hing himself down beside her, and clutched her hand eagerly, "don't be wise; don't be sensible, darling. It's March, spring is beginming in Enrope. It's a year and a half since I became an exile. Lut's go, beloved. You say yourself we have plenty of money; let's take ship for the land where beauty is inderstood, where it is put first, above all things. Let's go back to Franee, Mary!"

His face was fired with eagerness; he almost trembled with the passion to be gone. Mary flushed, and then grew pale with apprehension. "Do you mean break up our home, Stefan, for good?"
"Yes, darling. You know I've counted the days of bomlage. We couldn't travel last spring, and since then we ve been too poor. What have these last months brought us? Only disharmony. We are free now, there is nothing to hold us batek. We can leave Elliston in Paris, and follow the spring south to the vineyards. A progress a-foot through France, each day finding eolors rieher, the sum nearer-think of it, Beac. :ful!'" He kissed her joyonsly.

Her hands were quite cold now. "But, Stefan," she temporized, "our little house, our friends, my work, the -the place we've been making?"

298 THE NEST-BUILDER

"Doarest, all these we can find far better there."
She shook her head. "I can"t. I don't speak Frencl properly, I don't understand French people. I conidn sell my stortes there or-or anything," she finisher weakly.

IIe jumped up, his eyes blauk, hands thrust in hi pockets.
"I don't get you, Mary. You don't mean-you surel ean't mean, that sou don't want to go to France at all That you want to live here?"

She lioundered. "I don't know, Stefan. Of con:i you've always talked about Franes, and I should lon to go there and see it, and so on, but somehow I've eon to think of the Byrdsnest as home-we've been so hapl here-'
"Happy?" he interrupted her. "Yon say we've be" happy?" Ilis tone was utterly confounded.
"Yes, dear, except-execpt when you were so-so bu last autumn-'

He dropped down by the table, squaring himself as to get to the bottom of a riddle.
"What is your idea of happiness, Miry, of lifc fact?" he asked, in an musually quiet voice. She fi glad that he seemed so willing to talk things over, and concede her a point of view of her own.
"Well," she began, feeling for her words. "my it of life is to have a person and work that you love. then to build-both of yon-a place, a position; to ha friends-be part of the commonity-so that you" dren-the immortal part of you-may grow up more and more enriching atmosphere." She paus while he watrhed her, motimbless. "I can't imagine," she went on, "rreater hapuine for for people than to sec their rhihhem growing up stronir uml uselul-tall tions lufore us hato hath. Somethine to hamd our life on 10-ans it was in the hegimning --son know, Stefan-", She tlesibed with ther rfont to rxpleses.
"Then,"-his roice was fuictore still; sher did not see that his hamls wer" rlomehod ander the flap) of the talle"in this seheme of life of yours, how mamy rhihlerenhow mans simeamts, looms, all that sort of thingshould vou consider nerenssary?",

She smilec?. "Is for honses, servants and things, that just depensls on one's income. I hate ostentation, but I do like a beantifully run loouse, and I alome homes and dogs and things. lint the children-" she flushed again-"why, dearest, I think any couple ourght to be simply too thanl:ful for all the childen they ean have. luless, perhaps," she added naively, "they're frightfully poor."
"Where should people live to he happy in this way"?" he ankerl, still in those earefully gulet tones.
she was looking ont of the window, trying to formmlatte her thoughts. "I don't think it matters very much whrer one lives," she said in her soft, elear tones, "as lomis as one has friends, and is not too moneh in the eity. lint to own nue's honse, and the gromud muder one, to he able to leave it to one's son, to think of his son beiner lom'u in it-that I think would add emomously to one's hapriness. To belong to the place one lives in. whether it 's an old country, or one of the colonies, or anywhere." "I see," said Silofen slowly, in a voice low and almost humbh. Siartice, she looked at him. IIis face was knotted in a white mask: it was like the fare of some ereature unon which an iron door has bern shat. "Stufam," she exdaimel, "what-:"
"Wait a minute", he sabl, still slowly. "I suppon it's time we tallerel this thing ont. I ve bern a fool, atal judered, like a fool, h. myself. It stime we knew ratil other, Mary. All that yon have saliel is horrible to me- it's like a trap." She gave an exclamation. "Wait, lat me do something I ve never dome, lat me think ahont it." He was silmat, his faer still a ham, knoted masia Mary wated, her heart trembling.
"Yom, Mary", told mo somothing abont families in Fint land who live as yon describe-rou sald yom mothen belonered to ome of them. I remember that now.' I!, nodded shortly, as if "oncerling her a point. "My fathe" was a New linglamber. He was marrow and self-rient cous, and 1 hated him, hat he eame of people who hat faced a hamdred forms of death to live primitively, in stringe lamd."
"I'm willing to live in a stronge country, Stefan," sh almost eried to him.
"Don"t, Nary-I'm still trying to motorstami. I':
 what she was, but she was beantiful and passionate. she rame of a mixd rates she may have han gipey how -I don't know-lnt I do know she had armins. losed only rolor and movement. Nary-" he loub straight at her for the first time, his eyes were tortmed"I loved ton beranse yon were bantifnl and fre When your child bound you, and you berpun to collewt many thines and perple aboat von, I loved yon lese. ment some one olse who hat the beaty of eolor and mow ment, and I almost loved her. She told me the nan solue shut.

WINGS

Berber wasn't her own, that she hatl taken it breames it belonged to a tribe of wandmers-- Irabs. I almust howed her fore that alone. Jint, Sarp, sun still halid here I was faithful to gou becalue of evone beaty and the wee that had been between us. Thens sund rose ferm some petty little survomatines"- he cast atook of cont "anpt at the pretty furnishing of the ro rum-". some an lilar a starm opirit, I saw yon moving anmeng othwe vomm like seld to me in the jog of wild mownem, in Hur mylhm of the dance. Yon wore aty hrite, allis, s! andonly fre
 He rose amd pht his hamds on her shomblers. Her fare was as white as his now: Ilis hamets dropend, he almont beap away from her, the museles of his fare writhen. "My God, Many, I ve mowe wanted to think atment !om, only to fred and see yon! Now I munt thimk. This. this coistence that you have deseribed! Is that all yon ask of life? Are yon sure?"
"What more could one ask?" she uttricel, cla\% cl.
"What more?" he erid out, thowing up his arms. "What more, Mary? Why, it inn't life at all, this deadly, petty intricate day by day, summmalal ly thines, and more things. The hopeless, malterable tancmess of it:" IHe began to pare the room.
"But, my dear, I don't moderstand yon. We have love, and work, and if some part of som life in petty, why, every one's always has been, hasn't it?",
She was deeply moved by his distress, afmid again for their happiness, longing to comfort him. Yot, undur ant aprat from all these emotions, some cool little farblty of critieism wondered if he was not matime mather a theatrical scene. "Daily life nust be a little monoto-

302

TIIE NEST-BUILDER

nous, mustn't it?" she urged again, trying to help him. "No!" he almost shouted, with a gesture of fierce repudiation. "Was Angelo" life petty? Was da Vincis? Did Columbus "e tomomonsly, did Scott or Peary? Does any exp'ores wr traw er? Did Thorean surround limself with things-in :amper-did George Borrow, or Whitman, or Steveris'm? Do you suppose Rodin, or de Musset, or Roussean, or Millet, or any one else who has ever livect, eared whether they had a position, a louse, horses, old furniture? All the world's wanderers, from Clysses down to the last tramp who knocked at this door, have known more of life than all your generations of staid eonventional county families! Oh, Mary"-he leant across the table toward her, and his voice pleaded-"think of what life should be. Think of the peasants in France trading out the wine. Think of ships, and rivers, and all the beanty of the forests. Think of daneing, of musie, of that old riking who first found America. Think of those tribes who wander with their tents over the desert and pitch them under stars as big as lamps-all the things we've never seen, Marr, the songs we've never heard. The enlors, the seents, and the cruel tang of life! All these I want to see and feel, and translate into pietures. I want you with me, Mary -beantiful and free-I want us to drink life edgerly together, as if it were heady wine." Te took leer hand aeross the table. "You'll eome, Beloved, you'll give all the little things up, and enme?"

She rose, her face pitifully white. They stood with hands elasped, the table between them.
"The boy, Stefan?"
He laughed, thinking he had won her. "Bring lim, too, as the Arab women carry theirs, in a shawl. We'll leave him here and there, and have him with us whenever we stay long in one place."

She pulled her hand away, her eyes filled with tears. "I love you. Stefan, but I can’t bring my "hild up like a gipsy. I'll live in France, or anywhere you say, but I must have a home-I can't be a wanderer."
"You shall have a home, sweetheart, to keep con"ing baek to." His face was brightening to eagerness.
"Oh, you don't understand. I can't leave my child; I can't be with him only sometimes. I want him always. And it isn't only him. Oh, Stefan, dear'"-her voice in its turn was pleading-"I don't believe I wim come to France just now. I think, I'm almost sure, we're going to have another baby."
He straightened, they faced each other in silence. After a moment she spoke again, looking down, her hands tremblingly pieking at her handkerelief.
"I was so happy about it. It was the sion of your renewed love. I thonght we could build a little wing on the cottage, and have a nurse." Her voice fell to a whisper. "I thought it might be a little girl, and that you would love her better than the boy. I'll eome later, dear, if you say so, but I ean't eome now.' She sank into her chair, her head drooping. He, too, sat down, too dazed by this new development to find his way for a minute through its implications.
"I'm sorry, Mary," he said at last, dully. "I don't want a little girl. If she could be put away somewhere till she were grown, I should not mind. But to live like this all through one's youth, with a house, and servants, and people calling, and the place cluttered up with babies -I don't think I can do that, possibly."

She was frankly crying now. "But, dear one, ean't

304 TIIE NEST-BUILDER

we compromise? Ifter this baby is born, I'll give up the house. We'll live in France-I'll travel with you a little. That will help, won't it?"

IIe sighed. "I suppose so. We shall have to think out some scheme. But the ghastly part is that we shall both have to be content with half measures. You want one thing of life, Mary, I another. No anount of selfsaerifiee on either side alters that fact. We married. strangers, and it's taken his a year and a half to find it out. My fault, of course. I wanted love and beauty, and I got it-I didn't think of the eost, and I didn't think of you. I was just a damned egotistieal male, I suppose." He laughed bitterly. "Ily father wanted a wife, and he got the burning heart of a rose. I-I never wanted a wife, I see that now. I wanted to snare the very spirit of life and make it my ow-you looked a vessel fit to carry it. But you were just a woman like the rest. We ve failed each other, that's all."
"Oh, Stefan," she eried through her tears, "I've tried so hard. But I wa. "ws the same-just a woman. Only-" her tears br. afresh-" when you married me, I thought you loved me as I was."

He looked at her, transfixed. "My God," he whispered, "that's what I heard my mother say more than twenty years ago. What a mockery-each meneration a scorn and plaything for the high Gods! Well. we 'll do the best we ean, Mary. I'm utterly a pagan, so I'm not quite the inhuman granite my Christian father was. Don 't ery, dear." IIe stonped and kissed her, and sle heard his light, wild steps pass throngh the room and out into the night. She sat silent, amid the ruins of her nest.

1OR a month Stefan brooded. IIe hung about the house, dabbled at a little work, and returned, all without signs of life or interest. $I_{A}$ was kind to Mary, more considerate than he nsed to be. but she would have given all his inaninate, painstaking politeness for an hour of his old, gay thoughtlessness. They had reached the stage of marriage in which, all being explained and understood, there seems nothing to hope for. Alone together they were silent, for there was nothing to say. Eaeh eondoned but eould not comfort the other. Stefan felt that his marriage had been a mistake, that he, a living thing, had tied about his neek a dead mass of institutions, eustoms and obligations which would slowly crush his life out. "I am twenty-seven," he said to himself, "and my life is over." IIe did not blame Mary, but himself.

She, on the other hand, felt she had married a man outside the pale of ordinary hmmanity, and that though she still loved him, she could no lonerer expect happiness throngh him. "I am twenty-five," she thought, "and my personal life is over. I can be happy now only in my children." As those were assured her, she never thought of regretting her marriage, but only deplored the loss of her dream. Nor did she judge Stefan. She understood the witd risk she had run in marrying a man of whom she knew nothing. "He is as he is," she thought; "neither of us is to blame." Lonely and grieved, she turned for companionship to her writing, and began a series of fairy tales which she had long plamed for very young children. The first instalment of her serial was out, charmingly ilhastrated; she had felt rather proud on secing her name, for the first time, on the cover of a magazine. She engaged a young giri from the village to take Llliston for his daily outings, and settled down to a rontine of work, small social relaxations, and morning and evening eare of the baby. The daily facts of life were pleasant to Mary; if some hurt or disappointed, her balanced nature swung readily to assuage itself with others. She honestly believed she felt more deeply than her hushand, and perhaps she did, but she was not of the kind whom life ean break, Stefan miglit dash himself to exhaustion against a rock romed which Mary would find a smooth chamel.

THE NEST-BUILDER

While her work progressed, Stefan's remained at a standstill. Disillusioned with his marriage and with his whole way of life he fretted himself from his old sure eonfidence to a mood of despair. Their friends bored him, his studio like his house became a cage. New York appeared in her old gnise of mammoth materialist, but now he had no heart to satirize her dishonor. Ine wanted only to be gone, but told himself that in eommon decency he must remain with Mary till her child was borll. He longed for even the superficial thrill of Felicity"s presence, but she still lingered in the South. So fretting, he tossed himself against the bars through the long snows of an unusually severe March, until April broke the frost, and the road to the Byrdsiest became a morass of running mud.

In the last two wecis Stefan had begun a portrait of Constanee, but without enthusiasm. She was a fidecty sitter, and was moreover so hisy with her sutirage work that she eould never be relied on for more than an hour at a time. After a few of these fragmentary sittings his ragged nerves gave out completely.

"It's nttorly useless, Cunstance!" he exclaimed, throwing down his pallette and brushes, as the tehphome interrupted then for the third time in less than an home. "I can"t paint in a snffrage office. This is a stndio, mot the Club's headquarters. If you can't shut these pernhe off and sit rationally, please don't trouble to come again."
"I know, my dear boy, it's abominable, but what can I do? Onr bill has passed the Legislature; until it is submitted next year 1 ean't be my own or Theodores $s$, much less yours. As for you, you look a rag. This winter has about made me hate my country. I don't wonder you long for France."

Her eyes narrowed at him, she dangled her beads reflectively, and perched on the throne again withoat attempting to resmac her pose. "My dear boy," she said suddenly, "why stay here and be caten ly devilswhy not Hy from them?"
"I wish to Cod I could," he gromed.
"You can. Mary was in to see oar shop yesterday; she looked dragged. You are botl nervons. Do what I have always done-take a holiday from each other. There's nothing like it as a tonic for love."
"Do . .: really think she wouldn't mind?" he ex. elaimed eagerly. "You know she-she isn't rery well."
"Chtt," shrugged Constance, "that's only being more than usually well. You don't think Mary needs coddling, do you? She's worried becanse you are bored.

308

THE NEST'BUILDER

If you aren't there, she won't worly.
I shall take your advice-I shan 't come here again-" and she settled hev hat briskly-"and you take mine. Go away-" Constance threw on her coat-'go anywhere you like, my dear "itefan-" she was at the deor-"except south," she added with a mischievous twinkle, closing it.

Stefan, griming an aceiatively at this parting shot. unserewed his sketeln of Constanes from the easel, set it face to the wall in a eorner, cleaned his brushes, with the metionlous care he alwass gave to his tools, and ran for the elevated, just in time to eatch the next train fo. Crab's l3ay. At the station he jumped into a hack, and. splashing home as quickly as the liguid road bed woukd allow, burst into the honse to find Mary still lingerines over her luneh.
"What has happened, Stefan?" she exclaimed, startled at his excited face.
"Nothing. I've got an idea, that's all. Let me have something to eat and I'll tell you about it."

She rang for Lily, and he made a hasty meal, asking her unwonted questions meantime about hee work, her amusements, whether many of the neighbors were down yet, and if she felt lonely.
"No, I'm not lonely, dear. There are only a few people here, but they are awfully deeent to me, and I'm very busy at home."
"You are sure you are not lonely?" he asked ans. iously, drinking his eoffee, and lighting a cigarette.
"Yes, quite sure. I'm not exactly gay-" and she smiled a little sady-" "but I'm really never lonely."
"Then." he asked nervously, "what would yon say if I suggested going off by myself for two or three mouths, to Paris." Ife watehed her intently, fearful of the effect of his worls. To lis mbonnded relief, she appeared neither surprised nor hurt, hut, after twisting her eoffee eup thotarhtfully for a minute, looked np with a frank smile.
"I think it would be an awfully grood thing. Stafan dear. I've been thinking so for a month, hat I didn't like to say anything in case sou might feel-after ond talk-" her voice faltered for a moment-"that I was trying to-that I didn't care for you so much. It isn't that, dear-" she looked honestly at him-"but I know you're not happy, and it doesu't help me to feel I an holding wou back from something yon want. I think we slall be happier afterwards if you go now."
" "I do, too," said he. "but I was so afraid it would seem cruel in me to suggest it. I don't want to grow eallous like my father.". He shuddered. "I want to do the deeent thing, Mary." IIis eyes were pleading.
"I know, c'earest, you've been very kind. But for both our sakes, it will be far better if you go for a time." She rose, and, coming round the table, lissed his rough hair. He canelit her hand, and pressed it gratefully. "You are good to me, Mary."

The matter settled. Stefan's spirit soared. He raner up the French Line and secured one of the fer remaining herths for their next sailing, whieh was in three lays. He telephoned an eestatie eable to Alolph. Then, hurrying to the attic, he brought down his friend's old Gladstone, and his own suitease, and beran to sort ont his clothes. Mary, anxious to quell her heartache ly action, came up to help him, and vetoed his idea of taking only the barest necessities.
"I know," she said, "you want to get batek to your old Bohemia. But remenber you are a well-known artist now-the celebrated Stefan Byrd," and she courtesied to him. "Suppose you were to meet some charmin people whom you wanted to see something of? Do take a dinner-jacket at least."

He grimed at her. "I shall live in a blouse and sleen in my old attie with ddolph. That's the only thing i could possibly want to do. But I won't be fractions, Mary. If it will please $y^{n}$ in 10 have me take dress elothes I'll do it-only yon must pack them yourself!"

She nodded smilingly. "All right, I shall love to." She had failed to make her hasband happy in their home. she thonght; at least she would suceced in her manner of speeding him from it. It was her tragedy that ho should want to go. That onee faced, she would not make a seeond tragedy of his going.

She spent the next morning, while he went to town to buy his tieket, in a thorough overhauling of his elothes. She fonnd linen bags to hold his shoes and a linen folder for his shirts. She pressed his ties and brushed his conts, packed lavender bags in his underwear, and slipped a framed smapshot of herself and Elliston into the bottom of the Gladstone. With it, in a box, she put the ring she had given him, with the winged head, whith he had ceased to wear on late. She found some new poems and a novel he had not read, and packed those. She gave him her own soapbor and toothbrash ease. She cleaned his two bags with shoe polish. Everything she could think of was done to show that she sent him away willingly, and she worked so hard that she formot to notice how her heart aehed. In the afteruonn she met him in town and they had dinner together. He sulggested their old hotel, but she shook her head. "No dear, not there," she said, smiling a little tremnlonsly.

They went to a theatre, and got home so late that she was too tired to be wakeful.
"By the by:" she said next morning at breakfast, "don't worry about my being alone after yon "wo. whe. I thonght it might he triste for the first few hays, so I ve rung un the sparrow, and she's coming to oeconpy your room for a cous $\frac{2}{}$ of weeks. She's ofi for her yarly trip abroad at the end of the month. Sass she cam 't abide the Dutch, but means to see what there is to the in old Rhine, and come back by way of Tuscamy and France." Mary gurgled. "Can't you se her in P'aris, poor dear, 'doing' the Lourre, with her nose in a guidebook. Why! I'erhaps you may!'"
"The gods forbid," said Stefan devoutly.
He had brought hi paints and brnshes home the night before, and after breakfast llary helped him stow them away in the Gladstone, showing him smilinsly how well she hat done his packing. White her animed, she remembered to ask inim if he had obtained a lefter of eredit. IIe burst out iaughing.
"Mary, you wonder! I have about fifty dollar's in my pocket, and should have entirely forgotten to take more if you hadn't spoken of it. What a bore! C'an't I get it to-morrow?"
"You might not have time before sailing. I think you'd better go up to-diy, and then you could call on Constance to say good-bye."
"I don't like to leave you on our last day," he said uneasily.
"Oh, that will be all right, dear," she smiked, patting his hand. "I have ocemes to do, and I think you ought to see Constance. Get your letter of credit for a thousand dollars, then you'll be sure to have enough."
"A thousand! Great Scott, Adolph wonld think I'd robbed a bank if I had all that."
"You don't need to spend it, silly, but you ought to have it behind you. You sever know what might happen."
"Would there be plenty left for yon?"
"I3less me, yes," she langhed; "we're quite rieh."
White he was gone Mary arrand an impromptan farewell party for him, so that instead of spending a rather depressing evening alone with her, as he had expected, he found himself surronuded by cheerfal friend--heEwan, the Farradays, their next neighbers, the Haveus, and one or two others. Me Ewan was the last to leave, at nearly midnight, and pleading fatigne, Mary kissul Stefan good night at the door of her room. She dame not linger with him lest the stifled pain at her heart, should clamor for expression too urgently to be denied. But by this time he himself began to feel the impending separation. Ready for bed, he slipped into her room and found ler lying wide-eyed in a swathe of moonlight. $\Gamma$ : $t$ a word he lay down beside her and drew hor close. Like children lost in the dark, they slept all nieht in each other's arms.

Next day Mary saw him off. New York ended at thee gangway. Across it, they were in France. Freneh decorations, French faces. French gaiety, the belovel? French tongue, were everywhere.
"Listen to it, Mary," he cried exultingly, and she smiled a cheerful response.

When the warning bell sounded he suddenly beram grave.
"Say good-bye again to Elliston for me, dear," he smid holding her hand close. "I hope he grows up like you.

Ifer eyes were swimming now, in spite of herself. "Mary," he went on, "this separation makes on mams us. I hope, dedr, I beliewe, it will make hs. (ionl bless you." He kisseal her, pressed her to him. sudtenly they were both trembling.
"Why are we paring?" he eried, in a revulsion of ferling.

Slee smiled at him, wiping away hev trars. "It"s better, dearest," she whispered; "lit me to now." They kissed again; she turned hurriedly anary. He wate hed her cross the gangway-she waved to him from the dock -then the crowd swallowed her.
For a monent he feh bitterly berabed. "Itow ironic life is," he thomght. Then in shateln of French chatter and a gey langh reached him. The grampay lifted, water widened between the bulwarks and the dock. Is the ship swung ont he eanght the sea brecez-a flight of gulls swept by-he was outhomm!
With a derp breath Stefan turned a brilliant smile up the deek . . . Freedom!
disi?, hurping home with aching heart and throat, let the slow tears run mheded down here ehecks. F'rom the train she watehed the city 's outskints stremm hy, formless and ugly. She was very desolate. Int when, tired out, she entered her house, $f$ we enfolded her. Here were her ehild, the things she loved. her birds. here pleasant, smiling servant. Tere were white walls and gracious calm. IIer mate had flown. but the nest remained. ITer heart ached still, but it was no longer torn.
x

IIE day after Stcfan sailed Felicity Berber refomed from domisiana. The Sonth had bored her, withont caring her wrariness of Xew York. She drove from the Pemmatrania Station to here stadin, looked thromerh the books, overhated the stork, and realized with indifiorence that her hasiness had sutfored heavily throngh her absellee. She listened lazily white her lientenants, emphasizing this fact, imptored her to take up the work again.
"What does it matter," she mmrmened throngh her smoke. "The place still pass. Your salaries are all secore, and I have plenty of money. I may rome bark, I may not. In any event, I an boral," she ripphal ont to her landanlette, and drove home. At her apartment, her Chinese maid was already unpacking hel trunks.
"Don't unpack any more, Yo San. I may decide to go away arain-abroad perhaps. I am still raly bobt -rive me a white kirtle and telephone Mr. Marchmont to call in inl hour."

With her maid's help she undressed. pimed her hair hish, and slipped on a kherehigh tmaie of heave chition. Barefooted, she entered a large room, walled in white am? dall silver-the end opposite the windows filled by single mirror. Between the windows stood a great tank of gold and siver fish swimming among water lilies

Two chormons vases of dull glase, stanked with lilies against her homecoming, stood on marble peatestals. The floor was covered with a carpeting of dead blatk. A divan draped in yellow silk, a single chong chate inlaid with mother-of-pearl. and a low tahle in thalswed were the sole furniture. Here, quite abone. Fellieity damend away the stiffiess of her jonmey, dancel away the drumming of the train from her ears, and its dust from her langes. Then she hathed, and Yo San dressed lar in at loose robe of silver mesh, and fastemed hom hair with an ivory comb carved amd tinted to the mondel of a watere lily. These rites complete, Felicity slowly partook of fruit, coffee and toast. Only then did she reenter the dance room, where, on his chomy clair. the dangling Marchmont had been meomfortably waiting for half an hour.

She gave him her hand dreamily, and sank full length on the divan.
"Yon are more marvelous than ever, Felicity," said he, with an adoring sigh.

She waved her hand. "For all that I am not in the mood. Tell me the news, my dear Marchmont-plays, pictures, seandals, which of my elients are richer, which are bankirupt, who has gone abroad, and all about my friends."
Marehmont leant forward, and prepared to light a cigarette, his thin month twisted to an eager smile, his loose hair wagging.
"Wait," she breathed, "I weary of smoke. Give me a lily, Marchmont." He fetched one of the great Easter iilies from its vase. Placing this on her bosom, she folded her supple hands over it, closed her eyes. and lay still, louling iike a bakst version of the Maid of As.
tolat. Felieity's hints were usially sufficient for her slaves. Marelimont put away his eigarette, and proceeded with relish to recount the gossip with which, to his long finger-tips, he was charged.
"Well," said he, after an hour's general survey of New York as they both knew it, "I think that about covers the ground. There is, as I said, no ynestion that Einsbacher is still devoted. My own opinion is he will present you with the Nixic. I suppose you reecived the elippings I sent about the picture? Constance Elliot has only ordered two gowns from the studio since you left-but you will have seen that by the books. She says she is saving her money for the Cause." He sniekered. "The fact is, she grows dowdy as she grows older. Gunther has gone to Friseo with his group. Polly Thayer tells me his adoration of the beantiful Byrd is pathetic. So much in love he nearly broke her neek showing off his driving for her benefit." Marchmont sniekered again. "As for your friend Mr. Byrd-" he smiled with a touch of sly pleasure-"you won't see him, he sailed for France yesterday, alone. His name is in th:is morning's list of departures." And he drew a folded and marked newspaper from his poeket.

A shade of displeasure had erept over the immobile features of Miss Berber. She opened her eyes and regarded the lank Marehmont with distaste. Her finger pressed a button on the divan. Slowly she raised herself to her elbow, while he watehed, his pale eyes fixed on her with the expression of a ratting dog waiting its master's thanks after a eatch.
"All that you have told me," said Felieity at last, a slight edge to her zephyr-like voice, "is interesting, but I wish yon would remmber that while you are free to ridicule my elients, you are not free as regards my friends. Your comment on Connie was in poor taste. I am not in the mood for more conversation this morning.

I am fatigued. Good-day, Marelmont." She samk to her pillows again-her eyes elosed.
"Oh, I say, Felicity, is that all the thanks I get?", whined her visitor.
"Good-day, Marchment," she breathed again. The door opened, disclosing Y'o San. Marehmont's iesthetic vineer cracked.
"Oh, shucks," he said, "how mean of yon!", and trailed out, his cutaway seeming to hang limp like the de.iected tail of a dog.

The door closed, Felicity hounded up aml, ruming aeross the room, involed her own loveliness in the mirror.
"Alone," she whispered to herself, "alone." She danced a few steps, swayingly. "You've never lived, lovely creature, you've never lived yet," she apostrophized the dancing vision in the glass.
Still swaying and posturing to some inward melody, she fluttered down the passage to her bedroom. "Y" San," she called, her voice almost full, "we shall go to Europe." The stolid little maid nodded aecpuiescence.

For the next three days Felicity Berber, creator of rainent, shut in her pastoral fitting room and surromuded by her chief acolytes, sat at a table opposite Stefan's dancing faun, and designed spring gowns. Felicity the idle, the sommolent, the alluring, gave place to Felicity the inventor, and again to Felieity the woman of business. Scissors clipped, typewriters elicked, colored chalks covered dozens of sheets with drawings.
The staff became first relieved, then enthnsiastic. What a spring display they were to have! On the third day hundreds of primrose yellow envelopes, inseribed in green ink to the studio's clients, poured into the letterchute. Within them an amouneement printed in flowing green seript read, under Felicity's letterhead, "I offer twenty-one original designs for spring raiment, created by me under the inspiration of a sojourn in the South. Each will be modified to the wearer's personality, and none will be duplicated. I am about to travel in Europe, there to gain atmosphere for my fall ereations." After her signature, was stamped, by way of seal, a tiny woodcut of Stcfan's faun.

318 THE NEST-BUILDER

The last design was complete by Friday, and on Saturday Felicity sailed on the Mauretania, her suite of three rooms a wilderness of flowers. Marehmont, calling at the apartment to escort her to the boat, found the danceroom swathed in shecting, its heavy earpet rolled into a corner. Evidently, this was to be no brief "sojourn." The heavy Einsbacher was at the dock to see her off, together with a small pack of nondescript young me. Constance was not there, and Marchmont guessed that she had not been told of her friend's departure.

Einsbacher had the last word with Felicity. "I hope you will like the vlowers," he whispered gutturally. "Let me know if I may make you a present of the Nixie," and he gave a thick smile.
"You know my rule," she murmured, her lids heavy, a bored droop at the corners of her mouth. "Nothing worth more than five dollars, except flowers. Why should I break it-" her voice hovered-"for you?"-it sank. She turned away, melting into the crowd. Marelimont, with malicious pleasure, watched Einsbacher's discomfited retreat.

In her cabin Felicity collected all the donors' cards from her flowers and, stepping outside, with a faint smile dropped them into the sea.

XI

IT was the end of April, and Paris rustled gaily in her spring dress. Stefan and Adolph, clad in disreputable baggy tronsers topped in one ease by a painter's blonse and in the other by an intinitely aged alpaea jacket, strolled homeward in the early evening from their favorite eafe.

Adolph was in the highest spirits, as he had been ever sinee Stefan's arrival three weeks before, but the other's face wore a rather moody frown. He had begm to weary a little of his good friend's eestatie pleasure in their reunion.

He was in Paris again, in his old attic; it was spring, and his beloved eity as beautiful as ever. He had expected a return of his old-time gaicty, but somethow the eharm laeked poteney. He wanted to paint, but his ideas were turgid and fragmentary. Ile wanted exeitement, but the eity only seemed to offer memories. The lapse of a short eighteen montlas had seattered his friends surprisingly. Adolph remained, but Nimette was married. Louise had left l'aris, and Giddens, the English painter, had gone back to Lomblon. Perhaps it was the spring, perhaps it was merely the law which deerees that the past ean never be recaptured-whatever the cause, Stefan's flight had not wholly assmaged his restlessuess. Of adventures in the hackneyed sense he had not thought. He was too fastidious for the vulgar 319 sort, and had litherto met no women who stirred his imagination. Moreover, he harbored the delusion that the failure of his great romance had killed his capacity for love. "I am done with women," he said to himself.

320 THE NES'T-BUILDER

Mary seemed very distant. IIe thonght of her with gratitude for her generosity, with regret, but withont longing.
"Never marry," he said to Adolph for the twentieth time, as they turned into the rue des Trois Ermites; "the wings of an artist must remain unhound."
"Ah, Stefan," Adolph replied, sighing over his friend's disillusionment, "I am not like you. I should be grateful for a home, and ehildren. I am only a cricket scraping out my little musie, not an carcle."

Stefan snorted. "You are a great violinist, but you won't realize it. Look leere, Adolph, chnck your joh. and go on a walking tomr with me. Let's travel through France and along the Riviera to Italy. I'm siek of cities. There's lots of money for us both, and if we run short, why, bring your fiddle along and play it-why not?"

At their door the coneierge handed Adolph some letters.
"My friend," said he, holding up a couple of hills. "one cannot slip away from life so easily. How should 1 pay my way when we retmued?"
"Hang it," said Stefan impatiently, "don't you begin to talk obligations. I came to France to get away from all that. IIave a little imagination, Adolph. It would be the best thing that could happen to yon to get slaken out of that groove at the Opera-be the making of yon."

They had reaehed the attic, and Adolph lit a lamp.
"We'll talk of it to-morrow, my infant, now I must dress-see, here is a letter for you."

He handed Stefan a tinted envelope, and began leisurely to don his conventional hack. Holding the note under the lamp, Stefan saw with a stint that it was from Felieity, and had been left by hand. Excited, he tore it open. It was written in ordinary ink, upon pale pink paper, agreeably seented.
"My dear friend," he read in Fronch, "I am in l'aris, and chancing to remember your old address-("I swear I neser told her the number," he thought)-send this in ranth of you. How pleasant it would be to see yont, and to have a little comverse in the sweet French tongme. You did not know that it was my own, did you? But yes, I hase French-Creole hoors. One is happy here among one's own kind. This evening I shall be alone. Felicity."

So, she was a Creole—of the race of Josephine! His pulses beat. Cramming the note into his pocket he whirled excitedly upon his friend.
"Adolph," he cried, "I'm going ont-where are my. clothes?" and began hastily to rummare for his Gladstone amidst a pile of their joint belongings. Throwing it open, he dragged out his dress suit-folded still as Mary had packed it-and strewed a table with collars, ties, shirts, and other areessories.
"Hot water, Adolph! Throw some sticks into the stove-I must shave," he called, and Adolph, amazed at this sudden transformation, hastily obeved.
"Where do you go?" he asked. as he filled the kettle.
"I'm going to see a very attractive young woman," Stefan grimned. "Wow, what a merey I loroucht some decent clothes, eh?", He was already stripped. and shaking out a handful of silk socks. Gomething clicked to the floor, but he did not notice it. The dressing proceeded in a whirl, Adolph much inpressed by the splendors of his friend's toiket. A fine shirt of tucked linen, immacnlate pumps, links of dull gold-his comrade in Bohemia had eompletely vanished.

THE NEST-BUILDER

"O là, la!" eried he, beaming, "now I see it is true about all your riehes!"
"I'm going to take a taxi," Stefan announced as he slipped into his coat ; "can I drop you?"

He stood ready, having overtaken Adolph's sketehy but leisured dressing.
"What speed, my ehild! One moment!" Adolph shook on his coat, found his glasses, and was crossing to put out the lamp when his foot struek a small object. "What is this, something of yours?" IIe stooped and pieked up a framed snapshot of a girl playing with a baby. "IIow beautiful!" he exelaimed, holding it under the lamp.
"Oh, yes," said Stefan with a slight frown, "that's Mary. I didn't know I had it with me. Come on, Adolph," and he tossed the pieture back into the open Gladstone.

While Adolph found a taxi. Stefan paused a moment to question the eoneicrge. Yes, monsieur's note had been left that afternoon, Madame remembered, by une petite Chinoise, bien chic, who had asked if Monsieur lived here. Madame's ared eyes snapped with Gallic appreeiation of a possible intrigue.

Stefan was glad when he hed dropped Adolph. The stretehed at ease along the cushions of his open taxi. breathing in the warm, andacions air of spring, and watehed the faces of the crowds as they emerged under the lights to be lost again mysterionsly in the dusk.

Paris, her day's work done, was turning lightly, with her entrancing smile, to the pursuit of friendship, adventure, and love. Ail through the scented streets eyes sought eyes, voiees rose in happy laughter or drooped to soft allurement. Stefan thrilled to the magie in the air. He, too, was seeking his adventure.

The taxi drew up in the eonrtyard of an apartment house. Giving his name, Stefan entered a lift and was earried up one floor. A white door operned, and the small Yo San, with a salutation, took his hat, and lifted a eurtain. He was in a long, low room, yellow with candlelight. Facing him, open French windows giving upon a baleony showed the purpling dusk above the river and the black shapes of trees. Lights triekled their reflection in the water, the first stars shone, the seent of flowers was heavy in the air.

All this he saw; then a curtein mosed, and a slim form appeared from the balcony as silutly as a moth fluttering to the light.
"Ah, Stefan, weleome," a voiee murmmred.
The setting was perfeet. As Felicity moved toward him-her gown fluttering and swaying in folds of folden pink as delieately tinted as the petals of a rose-Stefan realized he had never seen her so slluring. Her strange eyes shone, her lips curved soft and inviting, her cheels and throat were like warm, white velvet.

He took her outstretched hand-of the texture of a camelia-and it pulsed as if a heart beat in it.
"Felicity," he half whispered, holding her hand, "how wonderful you are!"
"Am I?" she breathed, sighingly. "I have been asleep so long, Stefan, perhaps I am awake a little now."

Her eyes, wide and gleaming as he had never seen them, held him. A mysterions perfume, subtle and poignant, hung about her. Her gauzy dress fluttered as she breathed; she seemed barely poised on her slim feet. He put out his arm as if to stay her from mothlike llight. and it fell abont her waist. He pressed her to him. Her lips met his-they were ineredibly soft and warmthey seemed to blossom muder his kisses.

324 THE NEST-BUILDER

Adolph, returning from the opera at michight, domed his old jacket and a pair of slippers and, lighting his pipe, settled himself with a paper to await Stefan's coming. Presently first the puper, then the burnt-ont pipe. fell from his hands-he dozed, started awake, and dozed again.

At last he roused himself and stretehed stiflly. The lamp was hurning low-he looked at his wateln-it was four o'elock. Stefan's Gladstone bag still yawned on a ehair beside the table. In it, the dull glow of the lamp was reflected from a small silver object lying among a litter of ties and soeks. Adolph pieked it np, and lookicll for some moments at the face of Mary, smiling above her little son. He shook his head.
"Teh, teh! Quel dommage-what a pity!" he sighed. and putting down the pieture undressed slowly, blew out the lamp, and went to bed.

XII

ON a Saturday moming at the end of June, Mary stood by the gate of the Byrdsinst, looking down the lane. Heliwan who was taking a whole holiday from the office, had offered to fetch her mail from the village. Any moment he might be back. It was quite likely, she told hersilf, that there would be a letter from France this morning-a stemmer had docked on Thursday, another yesterday. Surely this time there would be something for her. Nary's eyes, as they stimined down the lane, had lost some of their radiant youth. A stranger might have gressed her older than the twentysix years she had just complet. l -she seemed irate and matronly-her face had a bleak look. Mary is last ketter from France had come more than a month ago, and a face can ehange much in a month of waiting. She knew that last letter-a mere surap-by heart.
"Thank you for your sweet letters, dear," it read. "I an well, and having a wonderful time. Nut much painting yet; that is to come. Adolph adnires your picture prodipionsly. I have found some old friend in Paris, very agreally. I may move about a bit, so don't expect many letters. Take care of yourself. Stefan."

No word of love, nothing about Elliston, or the ehild to eome; just a hasty word or two dashed off in answer to the long letters which sle h.d tried so hard to make amusing. Even this now, hat some after a two weeks' 2?5

3:6 TIIE NEST-BUILDER

silener. "Don't expeet many letters-" she had not, but a month was a long time.

There came Wallace! IIe had turned the corner-he had waved to her-but it was a duiet wave. Somehow, if there hand been a letter from Franee, Mary thought he would have waved his hat round his head. She had never spoken of her month-long wait, but Wallace always knew things without being told. No, she was sure there was no letter. "It's too hot here in the sun," she thought, and walked slowly into the house.
"IIere we are," ealled MeEwan checrily as he entered the sitting room. "It's a light mail to-day. Nothing but 'Kindly remit' for me, and one letter for you-looks like the fist of a Yankee schoolma'am."

IIe handed her the letter, holding it with a big thumb over the right-hand corner, so that she recognized Miss Mason's hand before she saw the Freneli stamp.
"Nind if I hang round on the stoop and smoke a pipe?" queried McEwan, pulling a newspaper from his pocket.
"Do," said Mary, opening her lettes. It was a long, newsy sheet written from Paris and filled with the Sparrow's opinions on continental hotels, manners, and morals. She read it listlessly, but at the fourth page suddenly sat upright.
"I thought as long as I was here I'd better see what there is to see," Miss Mason's pen chatted; "so I've been doing a play or the opera every night, and I can say that not understanding the languare don't make the plays secm any less immoral. However, that's what people go abroad to get, so I guess we can't complain. The night before last who was sitting in the orehestra but your hushand with that queer Miss Berber? I saw them as plain as daylight, but they couldn't sce me away up in the circle. When I was looking for a bus at the end I saw them grtting into nu verant wetris. I must say whe looked cute, all in wh rowe colon with a phall momb in her hair.

 have told him if 1 conll hand wh ally whote near him in the ing of going thromah to I.ondon for a werk, mid then satling."

At the cud of the letter Mary turned the last page back, and slowly read this paragraph arain. There was a dull dromming in her cals-a hame sermed to ber po morselessly pressing the bhod from lre laratt. She sat staring straight hofore her, afliml to think lest she should think too muth. At last she went to the window.
"Wallace," she celled. He jumped in, paper in hant, and saw her standing dead white be her chair.
"Ye've no had ill news, Mary?" he inked with a burr.
She shook her head. "No, Wallace; no, of romrse not. But I feel rather rotten this morning. Talk to me a little, will you?"

Obediently he sat down, and shook out the paper. "Hae ye been watching the European news much lately, Mary ?" he berim.
"I always try to, but it's difficult to find much in the American papers."
"It's there, if ye know where to look. What would ye think o' this assassination o' the Gramd Duke now?" He eocked his head on whe side, as if eagerly waiting for her opinion. She beram to rally.
"Why, it's awful, of com'se, but somehow I can't feel mueh sympathy for the Austrians since they took Bosnia and Herzeqnvina."
"What would ye think might come of it?"

328  THE NES'T-BUILDER

"I don"t know. Wallare-what wond you?"
"Wed," he said gravely, "I think som"thing's brewing down sonter-there li be tronble yet."
"Thos" poor Balkums, always lighting," she sighed.
"I'm fered it ll be mome than the balkans this time. Wateh the papers, Mary-1 dima' like the looks o' it miswl."

They talked on, he expombling his views on the menace of Austria's meareast anpinations as opposed to hasten intelligently-the effurt brought a little eolor to hel fare.
"Wallace," she siad presently, "do yon happen to inow where Miss Borber is this summer?"
"I do not," he said, his bhe eyes steadily watehing her. ," But Mrs. Filliot wonld ken maybe-ye might ask her."
"Oh, it doesn't matter," shid Mary. "I just wondered."

When McEwan had gome Mary read Miss Mason's letter for the thind time, and again the cold tanch of fear assailed her. She took a camp stool and sat by the eetse of the buff for a long time, watehing the water. Then she went indoors again to her desk.
"Dear Stefan," she wrote. "I have only had one nute from you in six wecks, and am naturally anxions to know how youl are getting on. I ant very well, and experet our haly ahont the tenth of October. Elliston is beautifnl; inagine, he is a your old now! I think he will have your eyes. I am sorry you are not gretting on well with your work, but perhaps that has changed by now. Dear, I had a letter from Miss Misun this morning, and she writes of having seen rou and Mise Berber together at the opera. Vou didn't tell me she was in Paris, and I can't help feeling it strange that you should not have done so, and should leave me withont news for so lone. I trust yon, dear Stefan, and belinve in our lure in spit, of the difficulties we have had. And I thinh :0n did right! to later
 I huw heard an litthe. Im I wromer atill In lather in our lowe? Only six montha ago wa were so hally lowether. Do youl wish ,ire marriage to come to lin vill! Plen-n writ. me, dear, aml
 I whall bear the shapenar math luger. I'm tre ine to be brate. dear-and I des bedieve still.

> "Yimir
> "Mary:"

Her hand was tremhlinge as she finished writing. She longed to ary mat, "Fior lionl's sake, comur bark to me, Stefan'-she longed to write of the wihl arhe at her heart-but she conld not. She combl not pheal with hime If he did not feel the pain in her halting senternes it would be true that he monger loved her. She seated and stamped the letter. "I mast still believe," she kept repeating to herself. There was nothing to do but wait.

In the weeks that followed it semmed to Mare that her friends were more than ever kind to her. Not only did James Farmalay montmally send his car to taki her driving, and Mrs. Farraday appear in the pony carriare, but not a day mased withomt Me Ewan, Jamie, the latvens, or other meightors dropping in for a chat, or planning a walk, a luncheom, or a sail. Constance, too, innmersed in work thoneli she was, ran ont sereral times in her ear and spent the night. Xeny was erratefne-it made her waiting so much less hard-while her friends were with her the constant ache at lep heart was Wruged asleep. Knowing Wallace she suspered his hand in this widespread artivite, nor was she mistaken.

The day after the arrival of Miss Mason's letter MeEwan had dropped in upon ('onstaner in the erming. when he knew sle would be resting aftee her stremmens day's work at headquartel . lis way of a compliment on her zown he led the convemation rutul to Felieity

THE NEST-BUILDER

Berber, and elicited the information that she was abroad. "In Paris, pe:haps?" he surrgested.
"Now you mention it, I think they did say Paris when I was last in the shop."
"Byrd is in Paris, you know," said MeEwan, meeting her eyes.
"Ah!" said Constanee, and she stared at him, her lids narrowing. "I hadn't thought of that possibility." She fingered her jade beads.
"I wonder if you ever write her?" he asked.
"I never write any one, my dear man, and, besides, what could I say?"
"Well," said he, "I had a hunch you might need a new rig for the summer Votes campaign, or something. I thought maybe you'd want the very latest Berber styles, and would ask her to send a tip over. Then I thought you'd string he: the loeal gossip. how Mrs. Byrd's baby will be born in October, and you don't think her looking as fit as she might. You rant a cute rattle for it from Paris, or something. Get the idea?"
"You think she doesn't know?"
"I think the kid's about as harmless as a shorteircuited wire, but I think she's a sport at bottom. My dope is, if there's anything to this proposition, then she doesn't know." IIe rose to go.
"Wallace, you are eertainly a bright boy," said Constanee, holding out her hand. "The missive shall be despatched."
"Moreover," said Mae, turning at the door, "Mary's worried-a little sheering up won't hurt her any."
"I'll eome ont." said Constanee: "What a shame it is-I'm so fond of them both."
"Yes, it's a mean world-but we have to keep right on smiling. Good night," said he.
"Good night," ealled Constance. "You dear, good soul," she added to herself.

ADOLPH was practising some new Futurist music of Ravel's. Its dissonances fatigued and irritated him, but he was lured by its horrible fascination, and grated away with an enraged persistenee. Paris was hot, the attie hotter, for it was July. Adolph wondered as he played how long it would be before he could get away to the sea. He was out of love with the city, and thought longingly of a possible trip to Sweden.

His reflections were intcrrupted by Stcfan, who pushed the door open listlessly, and instantly implored him to stop making a din.
"What awful stuff-it's like the Cubist horrors," said he, petulantly.
"Yes, my friend, yet I play the one, and you go to see the other," said Adolph, laying down his fiddle and mopping his head and hands.
"Not I," contradieted Stefan, wandering over to his easel. On it was an unfinished sketch of Felicity danc-ing-several other impressions of her stood about the room.
"Rotten work," he said, surveying them moodily. "All I have to show for over threc months here. Adolph," he flung himself into a chair, and rumpled his hair angrily,"I'm sick of my way of life. My marriage was a mistake, but it was better than this. I did better work with Mary than I do with Felicity, and I didn't hate myself."
"Well, my infant," said Adolph, with a relieved sigh, "I'm glad to hear you say it. You've told me nothing, 331 but I am sure your marriage was a better thing than you think. As for this little lady-" he shrugged his shoul-ders-"I make nothing of this affair."

332 THE NEST-BUILDER

Stefan's frown was moodier still.
"Felicity is the most alluring woman I have ever known, and I believe she is fond of me. But she is affeeted, eapricious, and a perfeet mass of egotism."
"For egotism you are not the man to blame her," smiled his friend.
"I know that," shrugged Stefan. "I've always believed in egotism, but I eonfess Felicity is a little extreme."
"Where is she?"
"Oh, she's gone to Biarritz for a week with a party of Americans. I wouldn't go. I loathe mobs of dressedup spendthrifts. We had planned to go to Brittany, but she said she needed a ehange of companionship-that her soul must ehange the color of its raiment, or some sueh piflle." IIe la'ighed shortly. "Ilere I am hanging about in the lieat, most of my money gone, and not able to do a stroke of work. It's hell, Adolph."
"My boy," said his friend, "why don't you go lome?" "I haven't the face, and that's a faet. Besides, hang it, I still want Felieity. Oh, what a mess!" he growled, sinking lower into his chair. Suddenly Adolph jumped up.
"I had forgotten; there is a letter for you," and he tossed one into his lap. "It's from Ameriea."

Stefan flushed, and Adolph watehed him as he opened the letter. The flush increased-he gave an exelamation, and, jumping up, began walking feverishly about the room.
"My God, Adolph, she's heard about Fclicity:", Adolph exclaimed in his turn. "She asks mie about it what am I to do?"
"What does she say; ean you tell me?" encuired the Swede, distressed.
"Tiens, I'll read it to you," and Stefin npened the letter and hastily translated it alond. "She's so generous, poor clear,' he groaned as he fimished.

Adolph's face had assumed a deeply shocked experession. Ife was red to the roots of his blonde hair.
"Is your wife then eneeinte, Stefan?"
"Yes, of eourse she is-she eares for nothing but hav. ing children."
"But, Stefan!" Adolph's hands waved helplesslyhe stammered. "It cannot be-it is impossible, impos sible that you desert a beautiful and grood wife who expects your ehild. I eannot beheve it."
"I haven't deserted her," Stefan retorted angrily. "I only eame away for a holiday, and the rest just happened. I should lave been home by now if I hadn't mot Felieity. Oh, you don't understand,' he groaned, watching his friend's grieved, embarrassed face. "I'm fond of Mary-devoted to her-but you don't know what the monotony of marriage does to a man of my sort."
"No, I don't understand," eehoed his friend. "But now, Stefan," and he brought his fist down on the table, "now you will go home, will you not, and try to ma'.. her happy?"
"I don't think she will forgive this," muttered Stefan.
"This!" Adolph almost shouted. "This you will explain away, deny, so that it troubles her no more!"
"Oh, rot, Adolph, I can't lie to Mary," and Stefars be gan to pace the room once more.

334  THE NEST-BUILDER

"For her sake, it seems to me you must," his friend urged.
"Stop talking, Adolph; I want to think!" Stefan exelaimed. He walked in silence for a minute.
"No," he said at last, "if my marriage is to go on, it must be on a basis of truth. I ean't go back to Mary and act and live a lie. If she will have me back, she must know I've made some saerifiee to eome. I'll go, if she says so, because I eare for her, but I can't go as a faithful, loving husband-it would be too grotesque."
"Consider her health, my friend," implored Adolph, still with his bewildered, shoeked air; "it might kill her!"
"Can't! She's as strong as a horse-she ean face the truth like a man."
"Then think of the other woman; you must proteet her."
"Pshaw! she doesn't need proteetion! You don't know Felieity; she'd be just as likely as not to tell Mary herself."
"I always thought you so honorable, so generous," Adolph murmured, dejectedly.
"Oh, eut it, Adolph. I'm being as honorable and generous as I know how. I'll write to Mary now, and offer to come baek if she says the word, and never see Felicity again. I ean't do more."

He flung himself down at the desk, and snatehed a pen.
"My dearest girl:" he wrote rapidly, "your brave letter has come to me, and I. can answer it only with the truth. All that you feared when you heard of F.'s being with me is true. I found her here two months ago, and we have been together most of the time since. It was not planned, Mary; it came to me wholly unexpectedly, when I thought myself curcd of love. I care for your, my dear, 1 believe you the noblest and bust beatiful of women, but from $k$, lase had sumething which a woman of your kind could newer give and in sjite of the pain 1 feel for your gricf, I cammet say with truth that 1 regret it. There are thinge in life and lowe of which you, my bentiful and clear-cyed Goddess, em linow nothine-there is a wild grape, the juice of which !ou will never drink, but which once tasted, must ever be desired. Becaluse this dramplat is se different from your own milk and homeg, becallase it leaves my tenderness for you all untouched, becallse drinking it hats assuaged a thirst of which you can lewe mo kmowlotye, I ask your not to judge it with high Olympian julpment. I ask you to forgive me. Mary, for I lowe ? I left you-and I hold you above all women. 'The cup is still at my lips, but if you will prant me forgiveness I will drink no more. 1 agonize over your grief—if yull will let me I will return and try to assuage it. Write me, Mars, and if the worl is forgive, for your sake I will bid my friond farewell now and forever. I am still your hushand if you will have methere is no woman 1 would serve but you.
"Stefan."
He signed his name in a dashing srawl, blotted and folded the letter without rereading it, addressed and stamped it, and sprang hatless down the stairs to post it.

An enormons weight seemed lifted from him. He had shifted his dilemma to the shoulders of his wife, and had no eoneeption that in so doing he was guilty of an aet of moral cowardice. Returning to the studio, he pulled out a cl $n$ eanvas and began a vigorous drawing of two fauns chasing each other round a tree. Presently, as he drew, he began to hum.

XIV

IT was the fourth of August.

Stefan and Felicity sat at premier déjeuner on the balcony of her apartment. About them flowers grew in boxes, a green awning hung over them, their meal of purple fruit, eoffee, and hot brioches was served from fantastic green china over which blue dragons sprawled. Fclieity's negligée was of the clear green of a wave's coneavity-a butterfly of blue enamel pinned her hair. A brecze, cool from the river, fluttered under the awning.

It was an attractive secne, but Felieity's face drooped listlessly, and Stefan, hands deep in the poekets of his white trousers, lay back in his wicker chair with an expression of nervous irritability. It was early, for the night had been too hot for late slceping, and Yo San had not yet brought in the newspapers and letters. Paris was tense. Germany and Russia had declared war. France was mobilizing. Perhaps already the axe had fallen.

Held by the universal anxicty, Stefan and Felicity had lingered on in Paris after her return from Biarritz, instead of traveling to Brittany as they had planned.

Stefan had another reason for remaining, whieh he had not imparted to Felicity. He was waiting for Mary's letter. It was already overdue, and now that any hour might bring it he was wretehedly nervous as to the result. He did not yet wish to break with Felicity, but still less did he wish to lose Mary. Without having analyzed it to himself, he would have liked to keep the Byrdsnest and all that it contained as a warm and safe haven to return to after his stormy flights. II ne nether wished to be anchored nor free; he desired both advantages, and the knowledge that he would be called upon to forego one frayed his nerves. Life was various-why sacrifice its fluid beauty to frozen forms?
"Stefan," murmured Felicity, from behind her drooping mask, "we have liad three golden months, but I think they are now over."
"What do you mean?" he asked crossly.
"Disharmony"-she waved a white hand-"is in the air. Beauty-the arts-are to give place to barbarity. In a world of war, how ean we taste life delicately? We cannot. Already, my friend, the blight has fallen upon you. Your nerves are harsh and jangled. I think'" she folded her hands and sank back on her green cush-ions-"I shall make a pilgrinage to China."
"All of whieh," said Stefan with a short laugh, "is an elaborate way of saying you are tired of me."

Her eyebrows raised themselves a fraction.
"You are wonderfully attractive, Stefan; you fascinate me as a panther fascinates by its lithe grace, and your mind has the light and shade of ruming brooks."

Stefan looked pleased.
"But," she went on, her lids ."!? drooping, "I must have harmony. In an atmosree $\because$ discords I cannot live. Of your present discordart m: od, my friend, I am tired, and I could not permit myself to continue to feel bored. When I am bored, I change my milicu."
"You are no more bored than I am, I assure you," he snapped rudely.

338  THE NEST-BUILDER

"It is such remarks as those," breathed Felieity, "which make love impossible." Her eyes closed.

He pushed back his chair. "Oh, my dear girl, do have some seuse of humor," he said, fumbling for a eigarette.

Yo San entered with a folded newspaper, and a plate of letters for Felicity. She handed one to Stefan. "Monsicur Adolph leave this," she said.

Disregarding the paper, Felieity glanced through her mail, and abstracted a thick envelope addressed in Constance's sprightly hand. Stefan's letter was from Mary; he moved to the end of the balcony and tore it open. A banker's draft fell from it.
"Good-bye, Stefan," he read, "I car't forgive you. What you have dune slames me to the earth. You have broken our marriage. It was a sacred thing to me-now it is profaned. I ask nothing from you, and enclose you the balance of your own money. I can make my living and care for the children, whom you never wanted."

The last three words serawled slantingly down the page; they were in large and heavier writing-they looked like a cry. The letter was unsigned, and smudged. It might have been written by a dying person. The sight of it struck him with unbearable pain. Ite stood, staring at it stupidly.

Felicity ealled him three times before he notieed her -the last time she hac? to raise her voiee quite loudly. He turned then, and saw her sitting with unwonted straightness at the table. Her eyes were wide open, and fixed.
"I have a letter from Connic." She spoke almost crisply. "Why did you not tell me that your wife wats enceinte?"
"Why should I tell you?", he asked, staring at hero with indiference.
"IIad I known it I should not have lived with you. I thought she had let you come here alone throngh phitegmatic British coldness. If she lost you, it was her affair. This is different. You have not played fair with us."
"Mary was never cold," said stefan dully, ignoringe her accusation.
"That makes it worse." She sat like a ranrod; her face might have been ivory; her hands lay folded across the open letter.
"What do you know-or care-about Mary?" he said heavily; "you never even liked her."
"Your wife bored me, but I admired her. Women nearly always bore me, but I believe in them far more than men, and wish to uphold them."
"You chose a funny way of doing so this time," he said, dropping into his ehair with a hopeless sigh.

She looked at him with distaste. "True, I mistook the situation. Conventions are nothing to me. But I have a spiritual code to which I adhere. This affair no longer harmonizes with it. I trust-' Felicity relaxed into her cushions-"you will return to your wife immediately."
"Thanks," he said ironically. "But you're too late. Mary knows, and has thrown me over."

There was silence for several minutes. Then Stefan rose, pieked up the draft from the floor, looked at it idly, refolded it into Mary's letter, and put both earefully away in his inside poeket. His face was very pale.
"Adieu, Felicity," he said quietly. "You are quite right about it." And he held out his hand.
"Adieu, Stefan,'" she answered, waving her hand to-

340

 THE NEST-BUILDERward his, but not touching it. "I am sorry about your wife."

Turning, he went in through the French window.
Felicity waited mutil she heard the thud of the apartment door, then struck her hands together. Yo San appeared.
"A kirtle, Yo San. I must dance away a wound. Afterwards I will think. Be prepared for packing. We may leave Paris. It is time again for work."

Stefan, walking listlessly toward his studio, found the streets filled with erowds. Newsloys shrieked; men stood in groups gesticulating ; there were cries of "Vive la France!" and "A bas l'Allemagic!" Everywhere was seething but suppressed exeitement. As he passed a great hotel he found the street, early as it was, blocked with departing cabs piled high with baggage.
"War is deelared," he thought, but the knowledge eonveyed nothing to his senses. He crossed ine Seine, and found himself in his own quarter. At the corner of the rue des Trois Ermites a hand-organ, surrounded by a cosmopolitan erowd of students, was shrilly grinding out the Marseillaise. The students sang io it, eheering wildly.
"Who fights for France?" a voiee yelled hoarsely, and among cheers a score of hands went up.
"Who fights for France?" Stefan stood stoek still, then hurried past the crowd, and up the stairs to his attic.

There, in the midst of gaping drawers and fast emptying shelves, stood Adolph in his shirt sleeves, methodically paeking his possessious into a hair trunk. He looked up as his friend entered; his mild face was alight; tears of excitement stood in his eyes.
"Ah, my infant," he cxclamed, "it has arrived! The Germans are across the frontier. I go to fight for France."
"Adolph!" eried Stefan, seizing and wringing his friend's land. "Thank God there's something great to be done in the world after all! I go with you."
"But your wife, Stefan?"
Stefan drew out Mary's letter. For the first time his e) ('s were wet.
"Listen," he said, and translated the lrief words.
Hearing them, the good Adolph sat down on his trunk, and quite frankly eried. "Ah, quel dommage! quel dommage!' he exclaimed, over and over.
"So you see, mon cher, we go together," said Stefan, and lifted his Gladstone bag to a chair. As he fumbled among its forgotten contents, a tiny box met his hand. He drew out the signet ring Mary had given him, with the winged head.
"Ah, Mary," he whispered with a half sob, "after all, you gave me wings!" and lie put the ring on. He was only twenty-seven.

Later in the day Stefan went to the bonk and had Mary's draft endorsed back to New York. IIe enclosed it in a letter to James Farraday, in whieh he asked him to give it to his wife, with lis love and blessing, and to tell her that he was enlisting with Adolph Jensen in the Foreign Lecion.

That night they both went to a vaudeville theatre. It was packed to the doors-an opera star was to sing the Marseillaise. Stefon and Adolph stood at the back. No one regarded the performaner at all till the singer appeared, clad in white, the French liberty cap upon her head, a great tricolor draped in her arms. Then the house rose in a storm of applause; every one in the vast audience was on his feet.
.. Allons, cnfants de la patrie," " legan the singer in a magnificent contralto, her eyes flashing. The house hung breathless.
" " Aux urincs, citoyens!" Her hands swept the audience. "'Marchons! Marchons!" She pointinl at the erowd. Each man felt her fiery glanee pieree to him -France called-she was holding out her arms to her sons to die for her" "Qu'un sang impur abreuve nos sillons:" " The singer gathered the great Hag to her heart. The tears rolled down her eheeks; slie kissed it with t'e ! 150 sion of a mistress. The house broke into wild whores. Men fell upon each other's shoulders; women whll al. The singer was dumb, but the drums rolled on-they were calling, calling. The folds of the flag dazzled Stefan's cyes. He burst into tears.

The next morning Stefan Byrd and Adolph Jensen were curolled in the Foreign Legion of France.

PIRT Y

THE BUILDER
nsen

IT was spring onee more. In the garden of the Byrdsnest flowering shrubs were in bloom; the beds were studded with daffodils; the seent of lilace filled the air. Birds flashed and sang, for it was May, high May, and the nests were built. Mary, warm-cheeked in the sun, and wearing a broad-brimmed hat and a pair of gardening gloves, was thiming out a clump of cornflowers. At one eorner of the lawn, shaded by a flowering dog-wood, was a small sand-pit, and in this a yellowhaired two-year-old boy diligently poured sand through a wire sieve. In a white perambulator lay a pink, brown-haired, baby girl, soundly slecping, a tiny thumb held eomfortably in her mouth. Now and then Mary straightened from her task and tiptoed over to the baby, to see that she was still in the shade, or that no flies disturbed her.

Mary's faee was not that of a happy woman, but it was the face of one who has found peace. It was graver than of old, but lightened whenever she looked at her ehildren with an expression of proud tenderness. She was dressed in the simplest of white colton growns, beneath whieh the lines of her figure showed a little fuller, but strong and graeeful as ever. She looked very womanly, very desirable, as she bent over the baby's earriage.

Lily emerged from the front donr, and set a tea-tray upon the low poreh table. She lingered for a monent, $34 \overline{5}$ glaneing with pride at the verandall with its green roeking chairs, hammock, and white ereeping-rug.

346  THE NEST-BUILDER

"My, Mrs. Byrd, don't our new poreh look niee, now it's all done?" she exelaimed, beaming.
"Yes," said Mary, dropping into a rocking-ehair to drink her tea, and throwing off her hat to loosen the warm waves of hair about her forehead, "isn't it awfully pretty? I don't know how we should have managed without it on damp mornings, now that Baby wants to erawl all the time. Ah, here is Miss Mason!'" she exelaimed, smiling as that spinster, in white shirtwaist and alpaea skirt, dismounited from a smart bieyele at the gate.
"Any letters, Sparrow?"
Miss Mason, extracting several pareels from her earrier, flopped gratefully into a rocker, and drew off her gloves.
"One or two," she said. "ITere, Lily; here's your marmalade, and here's the soap, and a letter for you. There are a few bills, Mary, and a couple of notes-"' she passed them across-" 'and here's an afternoon paper one of the IIaven youngsters handed me as I passed him on the roar.. He ealled out something about another atroeity. I haven't looked at it. I hate to open the things these lays."
"I know," nodded Mary, busy with her letters, "so do I. This is from Mr. Gunther, from California. IIe's been there all the winter, you know. Oh, how niee; he's eoming back! Says we are to expeet a visit from him soon," Mary exclaimed, with a pleased smile. "Mere's a line from Constance," she went on. "Fverything is doing splendidly in her garden, she says. She wants us all to go up in June, before she begins her anto speaking trip. Don't you think it would be niee?"
"Perfeetly elegant," said the Sparrow. "I 'm glad she's taking a little rest. I thought she ionked real tired this spring."
"She works so frightfinlly hard."
"Land sakes, work agrees with you, Mary! You look simply great. If your mew book does as well as the old one I snppose porehes won 't saticfy you-you 'll be wanting to bnild an ell on the honse?"
"That's just, what I do wann," said lary. smiling. "I want to have a spare romn, and proper place for the babies. We re awfully urowhed. Did I tell yon Mr. Farraday had some lovely phans that he had made years ago, for a wing !"
"Yon kon't say!""
"Yes, but I'm afraid we"ll later to wait annther year for that, till I can increase me simert story output."
"My, it semms to me you write them like a streak."
Mary shook her hoad. "No. altur laby is wemed I expect to work faster, and ever sor mond better."
"Well, if yon do any better than fon are drav: Framces Hodgson Burnett won't be in it; that's all I an say:"
"Oh, Sparrow!" smiled Nary, "she writes real grownnp novels, too, and I can only do silly little "hildren's things."
"They re not silly. Mary Berrd, I can tell you that," satited Miss Mason, shaking , out her paper.
"My gracions!" She turned a shomelk face to Mary. "What do yon smppose those Germans have done now? Sunk the Lnsitania!"
"The Lasitania ?" exclained Mary. intrednlonsly.
"Yes, my dear; torpedoed her withont warning. My,

348  THE NEST-BUILDER

ain't that terrible? It says they hope most of the passengers are saved-but they don't know yet."
"Let me see!" Mary bent over her shoulder. "The Lusitania gone!" she whispered, awed.
"No, no!" exclaimed the Sparrow suddenly, hurrying off the porch.
"Ellie not pour sand over his head! No, narghty!"

Nary sank into her chair with the paper. There was the staring black headline, but she cond hardly believe it. The Lusitania gone? The great ship she knew so well, on which she and Stefim had met, gone! Lying in the onze, with fish darting above the deeks where she had walked with Stefan. Those hundreds of cabins a labyrinth for fish to lose their way in-all rotting in the blaek sea currents. The possible loss of life had not yet come home to her. It was inconecivable that there would not have been ample time for every one to escape. But the ship, the great Enghish ship! So swift-so proud!

Dropping the paper, she walked slowly across the garden and the lane, and found her way to a little seat she had made on the sioe of the binff overlooking the water. Here, her back to a tree trunk, she sat immobile, trying to still the turmoil of memories that rose within her.

The Lusitania gone!
It seemed like the breaking of the last link that hound her to the past. All the belief, all the wonder of that time were already grone, and now the ship. her loveship, was gone, too, lost forever to the sight of men.

She saw again its crowded decks, saw the lithe, pieturesplue figme of the young artist with the eager face bendiur ower her-"Won t you be perfeetly lind, and come for a walk?" She saw the saloon un her adedoment night when she sang at the ship's eoncert. What were the last words she had sung?
"Then come kiss me, sweet and twantyLove's a stuff will not endure."
Alas, how unconscionsly prophetie she had been. Nothing had endured, meither love, nor faith, now the grat ship of their pilgrimate herself.

Other memories crowded. Their honeymonn at Shadeham, the sweet early days of their studio liéc, har glorious pride in his great painting of hove exalted. The night of Constances party, when, after her simginer, her husband had left his plawe ly liss berher and crossed the room so earerly to her side. Their first weeks at the Byrdsnest-how happe they hat been then. and how worshipfnlly he hat tooked at her the morninim their son was born. All gone. She hand amother baty now, but he had never seen it-neser would sere it. s!e supposed. Her memory travelod on, fitting ow or the dark places and lingering at every smmer peak of their marriage journey: Their week in Vermont! How they had skated and demeed together: how mush he semed to love her then! Even the day he sailell for framee he seemed to care for her. "Why arr we parting?" he had eried, kissing her. Yes, even then their marrase, for all the clouds upon it. had semed real-she hand never doubted in her immost heart that they were each other's.

With a stab of the old agery, Mary remmbered the day she got his letter admittiner his rolations with Folleity. The unbelievable breaklown of her whole life! His easy, lightly made exoluses. He, in whese armes she had lain a humdred times, with whom the han fiast landut. the sacrament of lowe, had given himelf to mothe: woman, had given all that most dose and sacred intima!? of love, and had written, "I eamot say with trmat that r regret it." Ilow she had lived through the reading of those words she did not know. Grief does not kill, or surely she wonld have died that hour. Her own strength, and the miracle of life within her, alone stayed her longing for death. It was ten months ago; she had lived down much since then, had sehooled herself daily to forgetfulness; yet now again the mutterable pamg sw pt over her-the desolation of loss, and the incapacity to believe that such loss could be.

THE NEST-BULLDER

She rebelled against the needlessness of it all now, as she had done then, in those bitter days before her little Rosamond camo to half-assuage her pain.

Well, he had redeemed himself in a way. The day James Farraday eame to tell her that Sitefan had elllisted, some part of her load was eased. The father of her ehildren was not all ignoble.

Dary mused on. How would it end? Woukd Stefan live? Should she-conld she-ever see him again? She thanked Gorl he was there, serving the comntry he loved. "The only thing he ever really loved, perhaps," she thought. She supposed he wonld be killed-all that genins lost like so mach more of value that the world was serapping to-day-and then it would all be quite gone-

Through the trees dropped the insistent sound of a baby's ery to its mother. She rose: the heary chouds of memory fell away. The past was gone: she lived for the futnre, and the fature was in her ehildren.

The next morning Mary had just bathed the baby, and was settling her in her carriade, when the Sparow, who, seated on the poreh with Elliston. was engaged in entting war maps from the papers and pasting them in an enormons seraphook. gave a warning congh.
"IHere comes Mr. MeEwan," she whispererl. in the hushed voice reserved by her simple type for allusions to the aflieted.
"Oh, poor dear," said Mary, hurrying across the lawn to ancet him. She felt more than ever sympathetio toward him, for Mac's wife hat died in a New Hampshire sanitarium only a few weeks before, and all his hopes of mending her poor broken spirit were at an end. Veaching the gate, she grave an involuntary (rys.

MeEwan was stumbling toward her almost like a drunken man. IIis face was led, his ryes bloodshot; a morning paper trailed loosely from his himd.
"Mary," he cried, "I eame hatek from the station to see ye-hae ye heard, my girl?"
"Wallace!" she exchamed, frightencel, "what is it? What has happened?', she led him to al sat on the poreh; he sank into it lanresisting. Miss Mason pusined away her serapbook, white-faced.
"The Lusitania! They were na' saved, ilary. There's o'er a thousand gone. O er a hundred Ameri-cans-hundreds of women and little hairns, Mary-lite yours-Canadian mithers and bairns groing to be near their brave lads-babies, Jary." And the big fellow dropped his rough head on his arms and sobbed like a child.
"Oh, Wallace ; oh, Wallace!" whispered Mary, fairly wringing her hands; "it can"t be! Orer a thousand lost?"
"Aye," he eried sumdenly, bringing his heavy list down with a erash on the wiclier tahle, "they drooned them like rats-God damu their homely sonls.""

His face, crimson with rage and pity, worked menntrollably. Mary covered her wes with her hands. The Sparrow sat petrified. The little lilliston, terrified by their strange aspeets, burst into lond wails.
"There, darling; there, mother"s hoy," arooned Mary soothingly, pressing her wet chmer to lis.
"Little bairns like that. Mar!"." MoEwin repeated Irokenly. Mary gathered the child close into her arms. They sat in stumned horror.

352 TIIE NLS'T-1BULIDER

"Weel," said MeEwan at last, more quietly. "I'll be going o'er to enlist. I would ha' gone long sine, but that me poor girl would ha' thocht I'd desairted her. She doesna' need me now, and there's eno' left for the lad. Aye, this is me call. I was ay a slow man to wrath, Mary, but now if I can but kill one German befure I die-" IIis great fist elenched again on the table.
"Oh, don't, dear man, don't," whispered Mary, with trembling lips, laying her enol hand over his. "You're right; yon must go. But clon't feel so terribly."

His grip relaxed; inis big hand lay under hers quietly.
"I could envy you, Wallaee, being able to go. It's hard for us who have to stay here, just waiting. My poor sister has lost her husband already, and I don't know whether mine is alive or dead. And now you're going! Elliston's pet mele!" She smiled at him affectionately through her tears.
"I'll write yon if I hear aught about the Foreign Legion, Mary," he said, muder his breath.

She pressed his hand in gratitude. "When shall you go?" she asked.
"By the next boat."
"Go by the Americam Line."
Ilis jaw set grimly. "Aye, I will. They shall no torpedo me till I've had ae shot at them!"

Mary rose. "Now, Wallace, you are to stay and lunch with us. You must let us make much of the latest family hero while we have him. Eh, Sparrow?"
"Yes," nodded Miss Mason emphatically, "I've hated the British ever since the Revolution-I and my parents and my grandparents-bint I guess I'm with them, and those that fight for them, from now on."

ON the Monday following the simking of the Lusitania, James Farraday received aldter from the Ameriean Ilospital in Maris, written in Freneh in a shaky hand, and signed Adolph Jensen.

New York was still strained and breathless from Saturday's horror. Men sat idle in their offices reading adition after edition of the papers, rage mounting in their hearts. Flags were at half mast. Little work was heing done anywhere save at the newspaper oftioes, which were keyed to the highest pitch. Farraday 's oftice was hushed. Those members of his staff who were responsible for The Child at Home-largely women, all pieked for their knowledge of child life-were the worst demoralized. How think of children's play-time stories when those little bodies were being brought into (gneenstown harbor? Farraday himself, the efficient, the eoncentrated, sat absent-mindedly readiag the papers, or drumming a slow, eeaseless tap with his fingers upon the desk. The general gloom was enhanced by their knowledge that Mae, their $\therefore$ ch: atherd Mac, was going. But they were all prowe of hata and eaught an carly atmown imin home. He drove straight to the Byrdsurst and 1,msul Mary alone in the sitting room.

By two o'eliet Farradey had read all the news twiee over, and Adolpte's lette: three times.

354

THE NEST-BUILDER

She rose swiftly and pressed his hand.
"Oh, my dear friend," she murmured, "isn't it terrible?"

He nodded. "Sit down, Mary, my dear girl." He spoke very quietly, unconsciously calling her ly name for the first time. "I have something to tell youn."

She turned white.
"No," he said quiekly, "he isn't dead."
She sat down, trembling.
"I have a letter from Adolph Jensen. They are both wounded, and in the Anerican Hospital in laris. The Foreign lagion has suffered heavily. Jensen is eonvalescent, and returns to the front. He was beside your husband in the trench. It was a shell. Byrd was hit in the back. My dear ehild-" he stopped for a moment. "Mary-"
"Go on," she whispered through stiff lips.
"He is paralyzed, my dear, from the hips down."
She stared at him.
"Oh, no, James-oh, no, James-oh, no!" slre whispered, over and over.
"Yes, my poor ehild. He is quite eonvalesecnt, and going about the wards in a wheeled chair. But he will never be able to walk again."
"Why," said Mary, wonderingly, "he never used to be still-he always ran, and skipped, like a child." Her breast heaved. "IIe always ran, James-" she began to ery-the tears rolled down her eleeks-she ran quickly out of the room, sobbing.

James waited in silence, smoking a pipe, his face set in lines of inexpressible sadness. In half an hour she returned. Her eyes were swollen, but she was calm again. "I'm sorry to have kept you waiting so long," she sitid, with a pitiful attompt at a simile. "IVrase rad me the letter, will you?"'

James read the lirench text. Stufan hal been so brave to sing to the others. A shall had strateli the tromeld; they ware nearly all killed or wommbal. Stefinn knew hu wonld walk no more, lut le was still so brabe, with a smile for every one. Ile was, drawing, tou, wonderfal pencil drawings of the front. Adntph thonght they wre much more wonderful than anything he had evor done. All the nurses and wommded asked for theme. didolph would be going back in a month. Ilo viontured to ask Mr. Farralay to lay the athair lurfo:e Mrs. Bỵd. stefan had no money, and no onn to take care of him when he loft the hospital. IIe, Adolph, Womld do all that was possible, hat ho was sure that his friond shonlel aro home. Stefan often, very often, spoke of his wifo to Alolph. He wore a ring of hers. Wonld Irr, Farmady use his good offices?

James folded the letter and looked at Nary.
"I mmst go and froteh him," sha said simply.
"Mrs. Byrd-Mary-I want you to lot mo go. Nas has offered to do it before enlisting. bnt 1 don't think your husband eared for Mae, and he always liked me. It wonldn't be fair to the baby for yon to irn, and it would be very painful for vou. But it will give me real hap. piness-the first thing I've been able to do in this awful business."
"Oh, no, James, I couldn't let you. Your work-it is too mueh altogether.'"
"The office can manage withont me for three woks. I want you to let me do this for you both-it's such a small thing.'

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)

"I feel I ought to go, James," she reiterated, "I ought to be there."
"You can't take the baby-and she mustn"t suffer," he urged. "There will be any amount of red tape. You really must let me go."
They disenssed it for some time, and at last she agreed, for the sake of the sinall Rosamond. She began to see, too, that there would be much for her to do at this end. With her raeial habit of being coolest in an emergency, Mary found herself mentally reorganizing the régime of the Byrdsnest, and rapidly reviewing one possible means after another of ensmring Stefan's comfort. She talked over her plans with James, and before he left that afternoon their arrangements were made. On one point he was obliged to give way. Stefan's money, which he had returned to Nary before enlisting, was still intact, and she insisted it shotild be used for the expenses of the double journey. Enough would be left to carry out her plans at this end, and Stefan would know that he was in no sense an object of charity.

James, anxious as le was to help his friends in all ways, had to admit that she was right. IHe was infinitely relieved that the neeessity for practieal action had so eompletely steadied her. He knew now that she would be almost too busy in the intervening weeks for distress.

The nest day James engaged his passage, sent a long cable to Adolph, and performed prodigies of work at the office. By meatis of some wire-pulling he and Mae suceeeded in seemring a cabin together on the next American liner out.

Mcanwhile, Mary began her eampaign. At brealifast she expounded her plans to Miss Mason, who had received the news overnight.
ght
"You see, Sparrow, she said, "we dm't know how much quiet lie will need, but we eouldn't pive hinang in this little cottage, with the babies. So 1 shat fit mp the studio-a big room for him, a small one for the nurse, and a bath. The uurse will be the hardent part, for I'm sure he would rather have a man. The tomble helphessness'" -her voice faltered for a serond-"world hmmiliate him before a woman. But it must be the right man, Sparrow, some one he can like-win) won tt jar him-ant some one we ean afford to keep permandmy. I've been thinking abont it all night and, do you know, I hawo an idea. Do ?ou remember my telling you about Alolph Jensen's brother?'"
"The old one, who failed over here?"
"Yes. Stefan helped him, you know, and I'm sure he was awfully grateful. When the berber shop changed hands in January, I wondered what would beeme of him; I believe Miss Berber was only using him out of kindness. It seems to me he might be just the person, if we could find him."
"You're a smart girl, Mary, and as plucky as they make 'em," nodded the spinster.
"Oh, Sparrow, when I think of his helplessness! He, who always wanted wings!" Mary half choked.
"Now," said Miss Mason, rising briskly, "we ve got to act, not think. Come along, child, and let's go over to the barn." Gratefully Mary followed her.

Enquiries at the now elcapened and popularized berber studio elicited Jensen’s old address, and Mary drove there in a taxi, only to find that he had moved to an even poorer quarter of the eity. She diseovered his lodgings at last, in a slum on the lower east ville. He was ont, looking for a job, the landlady thought, but Mary left a note for him, with a bill inside it, asking him to come out to Crabis Bay the next morning. She hurried back to Rosamond, and found that the exeellent sparrow had already held lively conferences with the village buiders and plumbers.

3.58

"I told "em they'd get a bonus for finishing the job in three weeks, and I guess I got the whole outfit on the jump," said she with satisfaction. "Thongh the dear Lord knows," she added, "if the pimbers get through on seledule it 'll be the first time in history."

When Itenril: Jensen arrived next day Mary took an instant liking to lim. He was shabbier and more hopeless than ever, but his eyes were kind, his month gentle, and when she spoke of Stefan lis face lighted up.

She told him the story of the two frien'ls, of his brother's wound and Stefan's crippling, and saw that his eyes filled with tears.
"IIe was wouderful to me, Mrs. Byrd, he gave me a chance. I was making good, too, till Miss Berber left and the whole seheme fell to pieces. I'm glad Adolph is with him; it was very gracious of you in let me hear about it."
"Are you very busy now, Mr. Jensen?"
IIe smiled hopelessly.
"Yes, very busy-looking for work. I'm down and out, Mrs. Byrd."

She unfolded her seheme to him.
fan would need some one near him night and day. se wonld be miserable with a scrvant; he would-she knew-feel his helplessness more keenly in the presence of a woman. She lerself could help, but she had her work, and the ehildren. Mr. Jensen would be one of the family. She could ofter him a home, and a salan'y which she hoped would be sulficient for his needs-
"I have no needs, Mres. liyrd," he interrupted at this point, his eges shining with earerness. "Enomph flothers for deceney, that ss all. If I combla be of some use to yonle husband, to my frient and Aholphis, I shomblask no more of life. I 'm a hopeloss failure, ma 'ata, and getting old-you don't know what it is like to feel uthelly useless."

Mary listened to his gentle voice and watehed his finc hands-inands used to appraising delicate, beantifne things. The longer they ta ked, the more eertar: she felt that here was the ideal person, one bomad to hor husband by ties of gratitude, and whose ministrations conld not possibly offend him.

She rang up Mrs. Farraday, put the case to her, and obtained her offer of a room to house Mr. Jensen while the repairs were making. She arranged with him to return next day with his belongings, and advanced a part of his salary for immediate expenses. Mary wanted him to come to her at once, both out of sympathy for his wretched eireumstances, and beeanse shw wished thoronghly to know him before Stefan's return.
Luckily, the Sparrow took to Jenseri at once, so there was nothing to fear on that score. For the Sparrow was now a permanent part of Mary's life. She had a small independent income, hat no home--her widowed sistrr having gone west to live with a danghter-and she looked upon herself as the appointed guardian of the Byrdsnest. Not only did she relieve Mary of the honsekeeping, and help Lily with the honselold tasks, which she adored, but she had practicaly taken the place of nurse to the children, leaving Mary hours of freedom for her work which would otherwise have been unattamable.

The competency of the two friends achieved the impossible in the nex. few weeks, as it had done on the mentorable first day of Mary's honsekeeping. Mr. Jensen, with his traned taste, was invaluable for shopping expechitions, going back and forth to the city with eatalormes, samples, and orders.

In a little over three weeks Stefan's old studio had been transformed into a bed-sitting-room, with every comfort that an invalid eould desire, and the further end of it had been partitioned into a bathroom and a small bedroom for Mr. Jensen, with a separate outside entrance.
"Oh, if only I had the new wing," sighed Mary.
"This will be even quieter for him, Mrs. Bs.rd, and the chair ean be wheeled so quiekly to the house," replied Mr. Jensen.

The back window of llary's sitting room had been enlarged to glass doors, and from these a concrete path ran to the studio entrance. Mary plamed to make it a covered way after the summer.

The day the wheeled chair arrived it was hard for her to keep back the tears. It was a beantifully made thing of springs, eushions, and rubber tires. It could be pushed, or hand-propelled by the ocenpant. It could be lowered, heightened, or tilted. It was all that a ehair could be-but how to picture Stefan in it, he of the lithe steps and quick, agile movements, the sudden turns and the swift, almost ruming walk? He. heart trem bled with pity at the thought.

They had already received an "all well" cable fron Paris, and three weeks after he had sailed, James tel graphed that they were starting. Ite had waited for the American line-he wonk have been gond a month

As the day of landing approathed, Hary bename intemsely nervons. She decided not to ment the lwat, and sent dannes a wirehss to that offert. She what ren wee Stefan first among all those crowds; her instinel tok her that he, too, woukd not wish it.

The ship docked on saturday. The day before the were as perfect at care and taste combl make them. Sarly on Satneday moning Ilr. Jensen stated for the city, carrying a big bunch of roses- Mary s weforme to her husband. While the sparion flew about the home gilding the lily of elemliness. Mary, with Elliston at her skirts, pieked the flowers destined for Stefan's ronm. These slie arranged in every aralable vasc--the studio sang with them. Every now and then she wond think of some trifle to beautify it further-a drawing from her sitting room-her oldest pewter plate for another ash-tray-a pine pillow from her bedroom. Ellinton's fat legs becane so tired with ceaselessly trotking back and forth behind her that he began to ery with fatigne, and was put to bed for his nap. Rosamond waked, demanding dinner and amusement.

The endless morning began to pass, and all this while Mary had not thought!

At luneh time James telephoned. They wonld be out by three o'eloek Stefan had stood the joumey well, was delighted with the roses, and to see Jensen. IIe was wonderfully brave and cheerfinl.

Mary was trembling as she limg up the receiver. He was here, he was on the way; and still, she had not thought!

362 THE NEST-BUILDER

Both chilhen asleep, the last conceivable preparation made, Mary settled herself on the porch at last, to faee what was coming.

The sparrow peeped out at her.
"I crness you'd as soon be left alone, my dear," she said, tactfolly.
"Yes, please, Sparrow," Mary replied, with a nerrous smile. The little spinster sliperd away.

What did she feel for Stefan? Mary wondered. Pity, deep pity? Yes. But that she would feel for any womded adier. Admiration for his eomrage? That, too, any one of the war's million heroes could eall forth. Determination to do her full duty by this stricken member of her family? Of eourse, she wonld have done that for any relative. Love? No. Nary felt no love for Stefan. That had died, nearly a year ago, died in agony and humiliation. She could not feel that her lover, her husband, was returning to her. She waited only for a wounded man to whom she owed the duty of all kindness.

Snddenly, her heart shook with fear. What if she were unable to show him more than pity, more than kindness? What if he, stricken, helpless, should feel her lack of warmth, and tenderness, should feel himself a stranger here in this his only refuge? Oh, no, no! She must do better than that. She must act a part. He must feel himself cared for, wanted. Snrely he, who had lost everything, eould ask so moch for old love's sake? But if she could not give it? Terror assailed her, the terror of giving nain; for she knew that of all women sh was least capable of insincerity. "I don't know how t aet," she eried to herself, pitifully.

A ir honked in the lane. They were here. Sh chair outside 11 .

 satw dames alight. The chanltemer ran to dhe chair. Jent sen stood inf in the eare amb some onn wat lifent fom it The chair whered abont and came towather her. It was throngh the gate-it was muly a sand an and "Mary", sath a wime. She looked up.
There was the wit-known fare, strangely yomer, the eyes larege and shathwed. There was his smite, rande and very amsons mow. There were his hambe those finely nervoms hamls. The? tals on a mus, hanath which were the once swilt limbs that conld never move arain. He was all hors . $\because$. His wings were brokem, and, broken, he was returame to the nest.
"Mary!"
She made one step forward. Stooping, she gathered his head to her breast. that hemet where la rlike, it ha:d lain a homdred times. Her arms hed 1 'oll close, her toars ran down mon his hair.
"Aly hoy!" she "ried.
Here was no lover, no husband to be forgiven. Cradled mon her hart there lay only her first, her most wayward, and her best loved child.

III

MARY never tohd stefan of those nightmare moments before his arrival. From the instant that her deepest passion, the maternal, had answered to his need, she knew neither donbt nor mhappiness.

She setthel down to the task of erating by her labor and love a home where her thre deperdents and rer three faithfla helpmates could tind the maximmon of happiness and peate.

The life of the Byrdsnest centered about Stefin; everv one thought fivst of him and his needs. Next in order of eonsideration e:me Ellie and little Rosamond. Then Lily had to be remembered. She must not be overworked; she must take enongh time off. Hemrik, too, must not be over-conscientious. He nust allow Mary to relieve him often enough. As for the Sparrow, she nust not wear herself out flying in three directions at once. She must not tire ho nes, learning typerviting. But at this point Mary's commands were apt to be met with contempt.
"Now, Mary Byrd," the Sparrow would chirn truculently, "you "tend to your business, and let me 'tend to minc. Anybody wond think that we were all to save ourselves in this house hint you. As for my trping, it's funny if 1 can't save you something on those miserablo stenographers' bills."

Mary was wonderfilly happy in these days-happier in a sense than she had ever been, for she had found, be36.4

 mg ：atmination．

 he hat fomed bedief in lif．
＂Mares，my beatifal，＂he said th her one day in sop． tember，as he worked at ant allintable drawine brame all of rmming of flyinge＂•

＂Yes，dearrest，I used to try oflon to think ont the significance of it．＂

They were in the studio．Mary had inst dropmed her pencil after at comple of hourse wo．．on an mex simal she was writing．She often worked now in stufan＇s romm．He was busy with a serices of dramines of the war．Ite had tried different media－pastel，ink，pereik， and chalks－to sce which were the casiest for sedentar： work．
＂It＇s good－bye to oils，＂he had saici，＂I couhln＇t paint a fout from the camvas．＂

Now he was nsins a mixture of chatk and ehamonat and was in the act of finishing the sixth drawing of his series．The big donss of the harn were opened wike to the sumny lawn，quy with a riot of multicolomed dahlias．
＂It＇s ocid，＂sald Stefan．pushing alvay his homet and turning the whects of his chair so that he faced the brilliant stilhess of the garden，＂but I seem never to

36 fif

have understood my work till now. I nsed always to maint flight party bexame it was beamtilal in itsilf but atso, I think, with sume hate notion that swift meatomes hary callu allel sat hy him, taking his hame.

 even from the grat reatity of ond mariage berame it meant respmsibilitios and momons, and they semparal ngly dings to me. Amb now, hary," ho smitad. "now that I coll mever shomber pesponsibilities arain, and ant condemmed to hiferony monotony" -she pressed his hand-"mither sems noty" ally mene. The tonth is, I thought I fled to grot away from thines, and it was really to gret away foom myolf. Now that I'se sem such horrors, such awful sulfering, and such minberlievable sacrifice, I have something to think about so much more deal than my vain, eqotistical solf. I know what my work is now, something murd better than jnst creating bemty. I gave my body to Frame-that was nothing. But now I have to give her my sont--I have to try am' ake it a woice to tell the world a litthe of what she has dome. Am I ton vain, dearest, in thinking that these really say something big?"

He nodded toward his first five drawings, which hong in a row on the wall.
"Oh. Stefan, yon know what I think of them," she said, her ceyes shining.
"Would you mind piming up the now one, Mary, so that we ean see them all together?",

She rose and, unfastening the drawing from its board. pinned it beside the others. Then she turned his chain to face them, and they both lowkit vilutly at the pine tures.

TII K 13: 11.1 )

 artist. The soml of a mattom was thror an! ind in alwas so murh greater than the smul of arn indicilnal. The:

 tion.

For the twemthth time Mare cers montmed in she looked at them.

The shadows beran to hemethen. Shonts billu from the sloper, and presently bllie's starl! fonm appeamel through the trese, followed by the sommbat divhermed Sparrow farrying Rosamond, who wats smiting her shonlder and crowing loredly.
"I'll eome and help yon in a fow mimbes, Spartow." Mary called, as the procession erossed the lawn, her fare beaning love $\mathrm{u}_{\mathrm{j}}$ it.
"Can yon spar" the few mimutes, dear?" Stefan asked, watehing her.
"Yes, indeed, they wom"t ueed me yet."
The light was gnite golden now; the dahlias seemed on fire under it.
"Mary," said Stefan, "I've been thinking a lot about you lately."
"Have you, dear?"
"Yes, I never tricd to understand you in the old days. I had never met your sort of woman before, and didn't trouble to think about you exeept as a beautiful being to love. I was too busy thinking about myself," he smiled. "I wondered, without understanding it, where you got your strength, why everything you touched seemed to turn to order and helpfulness under your hands. I think now it is because you are always so true to lifeto the things life really means. Every one always approves and upholds you, beeause in you the race itself is expressed, not merely one of its sports, as with me."

368

TIIE NEST-BUILDER

She looked a little puzzled. "Do you mean, dearest, beeause I have ehildren?"
"No, Beautiful, any one ean do that. I mean because you have in perfeet balance and controi all the qualitics that should be passed on to children, if the race is to be happy. You are so divinely normal, Mary, that's what it is, and yet you are not dull."
"Oh, I'm afraid I am," smiled Mary, "rather a bromide, in fact."

IIe shook his head, with his old brilliant smile.
"Nu, dearest, nobody as beautiful and as vital as you can be duli to any one who is not ont of tune with life. I used to be that, so I'm afraid I thought you so. now and then."
"I know you did," she laughed, "and I thought you fearfully erratic."

IIe laughed back. They had both passed the stage in which the truth has power to hurt.
"I remember Mr. Gunther talking to me a little as you have been doing," she recalled, "when he eame to model me. I don't quite understand either of you. I think you're just foolishly prejudiced in my favor because you admire me."
"What about the Farradays, and Constance, and the Sparrow and Lily and llonrik and McEwan and the Havens amd Nadame Corriani and-"

"Oh, stop!" sle laughed, covering his mouth with her hand.
"And even in Paris," he conduded, holding the hand, "Adolph, ant-res, and Felicity Berber. Are they all 'prejudiced in your favor? ?',
"Why do you inchute the last named?" she asked, rather low. It was the first time Felicity had been spoken of between them.
"She threw me over, Mary, the hour she diseovered how it was with you," he said quietly.
"That was rather decent of her. I'm glad you told me that," she answered after a panse.
"All this brings me to what I really want to say," he eontinued, still holding her hand in his. "You are so alive, you are life; and yet you're chained to a halfdead man."
"Oh, don't, dearest," she whispered, depply distressed.
"Yes, let me finish. I shan't last very long, my dear -two or three years, perhaps-long fnough to say what I must about Franec. I want you to go on living to the full. I want you to marry again, Mary, and have more beautiful, strong children.'
"Oh, darling, don't! Don't speak of such things," she begged, her lins trembling.
"I've finished, Beautiful. That's all I wanted to say. Just for you to remember," he smiled.

Her arms went round liim. "You're bad," she whispered, "I shan't remember."
"Here eomes Henrik," he replied. "Run in to your babies."

He watched her swinging steps as, after a farewell kiss, she sped down the little path.

IV

STEFAN'S moods were not always calm. He lad his hours of fierce rebellion, when he felt he could not endure another moment with his deadened eareass; when, without life, it seemed so mueh better to die. He had days of passionate longing for the world, for love, for everything he had lost. Nary fell into the habit of borrowing the Farradays' ear when she saw such a mood approaching, and sending Stefan for long drives alone. The rushing flicht seldom failed to earry him beyond the reaeh of his black mood. Returning, he would plunge into work, and the next day would find him caln and smiling onee again. He suffered much pain from his back, but this he bore with admirable patience.
"It's nothing," he would say, "compared to the black devils."

Stefan's courage was enormonsly fortified by the suceess of his drawings, which ereated little less than a sensation. Reproductions of them appeared for some weeks in The Household Review, and were reeopied everywhere. The originals were exhibited by Constantine in November.
"Here," wrote one of the most distinguished critics in New York, himself a painter of repute, "we have work which outranks even Mr. Byrd's celelrated Danaë, and in my judrment far surpasses any of the artist's other achievements. I have watched the development of this young American genius with the keenest interest. I placed him in the first rank as a tech370 nichian, but his work- ith the exception of ther Namaib-at:peared to me to lack substance and insioht. It wis hrillimat, but too spectacmar. Wen his lamaie, thonsh an a surpri-ine imspirational phate, had at pality high rather than femme I doubted if Mr. leyrd had the stull of which preat art 1- make.
 If 1 were to smm up my inpression of them 1 shonh sily than ond the battlefied Mr. Byrd has discowered the one thing his work latcked-soul."

Stefan read this enhogy with a hmmorons irin.
"I expect the fellow's right," he said. "I don" think my soul was as strong on wings in the ohd days as my brush was. Without joking, thomgh," he went on, simldenly grave, "I don't know if there is sum a thing ins a soul, but if there is. such splendid ones were being spilled out there that I think, perhaps, Mary, I may hate picked a bit of one up."
"Dearest," said lary, with a kiss of comprehension, "I'm so prond of you. You are great, a great artist, and a great spirit." And she kissed him again, her eyes shining.

If the Byrdsnest was proud in November of its distinguished head, it positively bristled with importance in Deeember, when Constantine telephoned that the trisstees of the Metropolitan were newotiating for Stefan's whole series. This possibility had already been spoken of in the press, though the family had not dared hope too much from the suggestion.

The Museum bought the drawings, and Stefan took his place as one of America's great artists.
"Mary, I'm so glad I can be useful again, as well as ornamental," he grimed, presenting to her with a flourish a delightfully substantial cheque.

372

THE NEST-BUILDER

Ilis courage, and his happiness in his snceess, were an increasing joy to Mary. She blossomed in her pride of him, and the old glowing look came hack to her face.

Only one thing-besides her anxiety for his healthtronbled her. With all his tenderness to her, and his renewed love, he still remained a stranger to his children. IIe seemed proud of their healthy beanty, and glad of Mary's happiness in them; but the ir nearness bored and tired him, and they, quick to perceive this, became hopelessly unresponsive in his presence. Ellie would back solemnly away from the approaching chair, and Rosamond would hang mute upon her mother's shoulder.
"It's strange," Mary said to the Sparrow, who was quick to notice any failure to appreciate her adored charges; "they're his own, and yet he hasn't the key to them. I suppose it's beeanse he's a genius, and too far apart from ordinary people to understand just little human babies."

The thought stirred faintly the memory of her old wound.

V

THAT Christmas, for the first time in i+s history, the Byrdsnest held high festival. House and studio were decorated, and in the afternoon there was a Christmas-tree party for all the old friends and their children.

The dining-room had been closed since the might before in order to facilitate Santa Claus' midnight spiritings.

When all tie guests had arrived, and Stefan had been wheeled in from the studio, the mysterious door was at last thrown open, revealing the tree in all its glory, rooted in a floor of glittering snow, with its topmost star seraping the eeiling.

With shonts the older children surrounded it; Ellie followed more slowly, awed by such splendor; and Rosamond erept after, drawn irresistibly by a hundred glittering lures.

Crawling from guest to guest, her tiny hands elutehing toys as big as herself, her dark eyes brilliant, her small red motith emitting coos of rapture, she enchanted the men, and drew positive tears of delight from Constance.
"Oh, Walter!" she cried, shaking her son with vieionsness, "how eould you have been: monotonous as to be born a boy?"

After a time Mary noticed tinat Stefin was being tired by the hubbub, and sigualed an adjommment to the studio for tea and calm. The elders trooped out; the dhildren fell upon the viands; and Miss Mason canght Rosamond by the petticoat as she endeavored to ereep ont after Gunther, whose great size seemed to fascinate her.

374 THE NEST-BUILDER

The seulptor had given Mary a bronze miniature of his now famous "Pioneers" group. It was a beautiful thing, and Constance and Janes were anxious to know if other copies were to be obtained.
"No," Gunther answered then. laeonically, "I have only had three east. One the President wished to have, the second is for myself, and Mrs. Byrd, as the original of the woman, naturally has the third."
"Conldn't you cast one or two more?" Constance pleaded.
"No," he replied, "I should not eare to do so."
Stefan examined the bronze with interest, his keen eyes traveling from the man's figure to the woman's. "It's very good of you both," he said, looking from Gunther to Mary, with a trace of his old teasing smile. Mary blushed slightly. For some reason which sta did not analyze she was a trifle embarrassed at seeing herself perpetuated in bronze as the companion of the scuiptor.

When the guests began to leave, Mary urged the Farradays to remain a little longer. "It's ouly five o'elock," she reminded them.

Ars. Farraday settled herself comfortably, and drew out her 'haki-colored knitting. James lit his pipe, and Stefan wheeled forward to the glow of the fire, fitting a cigarette into his new amber holder.
"I have a letter from Wallace," said Janes, "that I've been waiting to read you. Shall I do so now?"
"Oh, do!" exelaimed Nary, "we shall love to hear it Wait a moment, though, while I foteh Rosamond-the Sparrow ean't attend to them both at onee and help Lily."

She retumed in a monent with the shery hahy.
"I "ll have to put her to bed som,", she satid, settliner into a low rorking "hair, "but it isn"t quite tinn vet. I suppose Jamie has heard his fatheres hetton."
"Oh, yes," said James, "and has dozens of his own, too.
"He’s sueh a dear boy," Mary contimed, "hes phaying like an angel with Ellie in there, while the sparrow fits."

James unfolded Mac's closely written sheets. and rad his latest accomis of the officers traning "onds with which he had been for the last six months, the grossip that filtered to them from the front, and his expectation of being soon gazetted to a Ilighland Rewiment.
"The waiting is hard, hint when once I wit with our own lads in the trewhes I'tl he the hapriest math aliwe." wrum Mae. "Meanwhile, 1 think a lot of all you dear perphe. I'm mure than happy in what gou tell me of bircl's sureress and of the bairns' and Mary's well being. Give them all my luve and congratulations."

James turned the last page, and pansed. "I think that's about all." hee said.

But it was not all. While the others sat silent for a minute, their thoughts on the great strugrole, Farraday's eyes ran again down that last page.
"Poor Ryrd," Mae wrote, "so you say leell not last many years. Well, life would have oken him anywy, and it's grand he's found himself before be end. Lie's not the lasting kind, there's too much in him, and too little. She wins, after all, James; life won't cheat her as it has him. She is here just to be true to her instincts-to chnose the timest mate for her nest-building. She'll marry awain, thongh the dear woman doesn't know it, and would be horrified at the thonght. Fut sle will, and it won't he either of us--we are too much her kind. It will be some other brilliant eqnist who will thrill her, wrind her heart, and give her wonderful children. She is a: instrument. As I think. I once heard poor Byrd say, she is not merily an expression of life, she is life."

THE NEST-BUILDER

James folded the letter and slipped it into his pocket. "Come, son, we must be going," murmured Mrs. Farraday, puttiug up her knitting.
"Rosanond is almost asleep," smiled Mary.
"Don't rise, my dear," said the little lady, "we"ll find our own way."
"Good-hye, Farraday," said Stefan, "and thank you for everything."

Mary held out her hand $t$ them both, and they slipped quictly out.
"What a good day it has been, dearest. I hope you aren't too tired," she said, as she roeked the drowsy baby.
"No, Beautiful, only a little."
IIe dropped his burnt-ont cigarette into the ash-tray at his side. The rocker creaked rhythmieally.
"Mary, I want to draw Rosamond," suid Stefan thoughtfully.
"Oh, do you, dearest? That will be niee!" she ex claimed, her face breaking into a sinile of pleasure.
"Yes. Do you know, I was watehing the little thin this afternoon, when Gimther and all the others wer playing with her. It's very strange-I never notieed before-but it came to me quite suddenly. She's exactl like my mother.'"
"Is she really?" Mary murmmred, tonehed.
"Yes, it's very wonderful. I felt suddenly, watehir her eyes and smile, that my mother is not dead after a Will you-'" he seemed a little embarrassed-"eon you, do you think, withont disturbing leer, let me ho the baby for a little while?"

[^0]:    "Madam," he fairly scowled, "it is as easy for the rich

